In Plainfield, N. J., the home of the distinguished Senator [Mr. MARTINE], at whose early retirement from this body we are all so sorrowful, the exhibit constructed by the baby-week committee, on which the board of health was represented, was sent through the public schools of Plainfield, and two welfare stations were operated for the summer as a result of the baby-week campaign.

All this has required a great deal of correspondence and a great deal of work on the part of this bureau. It has stimulated the movement of giving the babies of the country a square deal. We may make fun of it, but it bears the same relation to some of the social and economic questions as the Fourth of July bears to patriotism or Memorial Day does to reverence for those who have gone beyond. So that this whole work, as I have so far pointed out, is to conserve the children of this country.

We talk about a first-line defense and a second-line defense, and all these things. The children of the country are the main line of defense. The greatest horror of war is not so much the suffering and the sorrow that it entails as the fact that it is destroying minds. If an Edison had been destroyed in his youth or a Marconi or a Dewey, how would you replace them? We can not fathom the great injury that war is doing to civilization in all the world through the destruction of minds. This bureau is trying to prevent destruction in conserving the children of this country.

Not only has this bureau engaged in these main activities to which I have referred, but they carry on industrial studies, dependency studies as affecting feeble-minded children, child-labor studies, and so forth. We now have a national child-labor law, and in connection with that this bureau carries on child-labor studies. Just this morning there comes from the press a document entitled "Comparative Standards of the National Law and of the Laws of the Various States of the Union." That has required a tremendous amount of work. They have studied the question and have had special conferences, particularly in the cities, in connection with the work of caring for illegitimate children. If that is not a humane work, it would be hard to think of anything that is.

The question of orphan girls and fatherless girls is being investigated likewise. A library of reference has been established, and last year there were sent out publications and documents to the number of 330,737 copies. It required tremendous work to make the investigations, to prepare the documents, and to get them out.

Mr. President, I have taken enough time on this matter, and I only desire to say a word or two more. The work of the Children's Bureau is a work for humanity. We spend a good deal of time discussing tariff laws, the control of strikes, railroad regulation, and such things as that, but none of them are so important as the work that this bureau is doing. The future danger of this country, Mr. President, is not so much what comes from abroad as what exists in our own country. Our problem is largely one of better conditions, so far as the Government can help, for the laboring classes in this country—better housing, better care, better food, better opportunities. It is the problem of the little children of the poor more than it is of the children of the rich—the question of getting better chances in this country for the children of those who have to toil, for the little children who, in the great crowded tenement districts, hardly know what green grass or blue sky is.

All of this great work for humanity is bringing about in this country mothers' pension laws, visiting nurses, pure-milk stations, things to make life easier, healthier for people for whom it is now hard. That is the spirit of the great forward social legislation of this country, and some day it is going even further—to old-age pensions and industrial insurance for those working in hazardous employment. Call it State socialism or call it what we please, we can learn from some of the other nations of the world, notably Germany, how to take care of the children growing up, the aged, the infirm, and the crippled. This is a part of such legislative philosophy.

The only reason aside from that of duplication of work for cutting down this appropriation, as has been proposed, is that we must economize. Mr. President, I am strongly in favor of economy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is there not really another reason? Is it not true that those duties to society naturally come within the jurisdiction of the States, and that the Children's Bureau, while it is formed for the purpose of coordinating the work in the different States, should not be enlarged to such an extent as to duplicate that work; and is not there a little danger of enlarging it so as to really interfere with the work of the States by duplicating the work that the individual States are doing?

Mr. KENYON. There may be, Mr. President, but I think the work of caring for the children is a good deal like Divine grace—you can not duplicate it too much.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, is there not some danger, if the Nation undertakes that task, that the State is apt to let it go at that and neglect it?

Mr. KENYON. I am not advocating that the Nation shall take it all over.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I favored the establishment of the Children's Bureau for the purpose of gathering information so that each State could use it, but I do think there is now some danger of entering the field of work that ought to be taken care of by the individual States, and which must be done locally if it is done well at all.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, I agree with the Senator; but the danger is not a very imminent one. The same danger exists in appropriations to fight the Hessian fly. Why do not the States take care of that, and why do they not also take care of the fight on the boll weevil? There is danger of getting over into State territory there. State rights are gone, however, when appropriations are involved.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Hessian fly and the boll weevil are interstate matters, and in such matters State lines are not very well observed.

Mr. KENYON. Well, take the case of wild duck in the Salt Lake Basin, to investigate the diseases of which we made appropriations last year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A duck is a migratory bird also; but children are living in one particular place and they belong to families.

Mr. KENYON. No; they pass from State to State continually, even the children of the poor, for the poor families migrate, some of them very frequently.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When they become interstate traffic it might be well to look after them; but I am speaking of children who live at home, as a great majority do.

Mr. KENYON. I have confidence enough in the Senator to know that he does not want to block anything that might in any way be helpful to the children of the country, and we need not be so careful about infringing upon the States and State rights. I have discovered that State rights vanish very quickly when an appropriation comes into view. At this session of Congress we will probably appropriate $800,000,000 for instrumentalities of warfare; we will spend $250,000 for free seeds to send out to an unsuspecting public. There is an omnibus fish-hatchery bill on its way over here; a public-buildings bill to supply buildings for towns, some less than 500 population; thousands for the foot-and-mouth disease, which has been cured nearly everywhere except around Washington; more on hog cholera. The Agricultural bill has liberal appropriations for citrus canker—I think over $400,000—to be disbursed principally in one State. Why does not the State rebel against such tremendous infringement of State rights? The boll weevil is appropriated for in this Agricultural bill. There is more money appropriated for the Plant Bureau in the Agricultural bill that we will soon pass than the entire sum appropriated for the Children's Bureau. For the Bureau of Chemistry we are appropriating $362,990—more than the whole amount for the Children's Bureau. For entomology we are appropriating $921,480. We are appropriating more than the amount the committee has saved on this item to exterminate the Hessian fly and the chinch bug.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator think the appropriations to which he is calling attention ought to be made?

Mr. KENYON. I am not prepared to say; but I observe that when you get an appropriation that goes to property questions, to save some orchards or to save some hogs—and I have been for that—or to save cattle, there is not much trouble about the appropriation; but it is different in the case of a little appropriation with reference to human life.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator did not vote to save the ducks. That was too small an amount.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah says I did not vote to save the ducks. I think I did not.

Mr. SMOOT. That was too small an amount.

Mr. KENYON. There are getting to be too many lame ducks. [Laughter.]

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am very much in sympathy with the views entertained by the Senator from Iowa on this amendment. As I shall show in a very few moments, I look upon it as one of the most important items of legislation which Congress has been called upon to consider. But I can not share the view the Senator has just expressed on the question of the appropriations for agricultural purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator understand that I am criticizing those appropriations? I am not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is what I think the Senate understands, and I want to ask the Senator to state that that is not his point.

Mr. KENYON. No; I am not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Those appropriations ought to be made. More good results come to the American people from the appropriations carried in the Agricultural bill, I think, than from any others that are made.

Mr. KENYON. I am not going to say that I agree with all those appropriations. I am on the committee. We are studying those appropriations. I am in favor of any of those appropriations where it is shown that they will do good; yes. I am simply showing that we make this kind of appropriations without much discussion. We do not cut those down much, but when we come to this other question it is different.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree that it is very much easier to get an appropriation to cure a hog with cholera than it is to get an appropriation to cure a man who is suffering with tuberculosis. I agree with the Senator about that, and I think it is unfortunate that that is true.

Mr. KENYON. I did not mean to be understood as speaking in a spirit of criticism. The Senator from Ohio and myself were largely responsible for a very large appropriation for hog cholera, and it did a great deal of good. I think the only opposition was from the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS].

The gypsy moth carries in this bill $305,000. Investigation and experimenting in the dairy industry, experimental feeding and breeding in the dairy industry—undoubtedly a good thing—large sums of money are spent for those purposes. I referred to the fact that the bill carries $419,380 for salaries in connection with the plant industry, and a large sum in addition thereto for general expenses. We are appropriating in the agricultural bill for diseases of orchards, diseases of potatoes, and other relatives of the potato, $87,000. I am simply citing these things to make the point that we ought not to economize on anything that may be of service in caring for the children of the country.

We can figure the worth of orchards or fruit that may be affected by some bug or scab. We can figure the worth of hogs that may die through the cholera, or cattle that may be destroyed through the foot-and-mouth disease. We can figure these things; but we can not figure what the child or the baby is worth.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I certainly want to see this work carried on, and I am in sympathy with what the Senator says with respect to looking after what may be termed the welfare of the child. I think the Senator will agree with me, however, that this work ought not to be duplicated, and we are both interested in having this work done by the department which is best equipped for it. The only question in my mind is as to whether or not the Children's Bureau, for instance, is better equipped than the Health Bureau to investigate the questions concerning infant mortality due to many of these serious contagious and infectious diseases.

Mr. KENYON. I want to get this fact in the Senator's mind, outside of that question—that the investigations of the Children's Bureau are not confined to the medical aspect of these questions. They investigate the industrial questions that affect children—the crowded tenements, the mining districts up in the mountains, and so forth.

Mr. POMERENE. I agree with the Senator, I think.

Mr. KENYON. There is no bureau in the Department of Labor, of which this is a part, making any investigation of those industrial questions affecting child life and child welfare.

Mr. POMERENE. So far as the industrial feature of the case is concerned, I agree with the Senator that that part of the work should be carried on by the Children's Bureau; and I have every confidence that it will be properly done. But it does seem to me that when it comes to the question of the investigation of children's diseases, the health bureau, by reason of the fact that they have specialists along that line, are better equipped for that part of the work than the Children's Bureau.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, that bureau would not investigate at all the question of the effect of poverty, poor feeding, bad ventilation, crowded houses, and all of those kindred subjects which enter into the investigation that the Children's Bureau makes. They would not touch that.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true.

Mr. KENYON. And that is just as important, as the Senator knows, as the medical question.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he is familiar with the work that has been done and is being done by what is called the child-labor committee that was organized under the Bureau of Labor some years ago? As I understand, they have been investigating, and investigating very thoroughly, this industrial question and its effect upon child life.

Mr. KENYON. That was some years ago.

Mr. WORKS. But they are still in existence, and, as I understand, are still pursuing that work, and pursuing it very diligently, and making reports about it. I happen to know something about that, because I have been a contributor to the expenses for a number of years.

Mr. KENYON. Is that work carried on by private contributions?

Mr. WORKS. Partly so; I do not know to what extent.

Mr. KENYON. I am not familiar with that. I thought the Senator referred to the investigations made by the Department of Labor some years ago of the child-labor question, published in a large number of volumes.

Mr. WORKS. As I understand, that was done by this same committee. I may be mistaken about that, but that is my understanding—that something like 20 volumes of it were published.

Mr. KENYON. I am familiar with those volumes.

Mr. WORKS. I am not.

Mr. KENYON. But they were published by the Department of Labor, not by any private committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa is right in saying that the investigation was made under the Department of Labor. The report consisted of 20 volumes, and the Senate authorized their printing. The printing alone cost $43,000, and I will say to the Senator that the books were never called for.

Mr. KENYON. Some of them were called for.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, a few of them were; that is, in the case of 1 volume out of the 20 all the copies were taken; the other 19 volumes were not taken. But I am not complaining about that.

Mr. KENYON. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. I was simply telling the history of it.

Mr. KENYON. That proves that the right people apparently did not take an interest in the result of the investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. But what I was going to say in relation to the statement just made by the Senator from California was that the Bureau of Labor, outside of the Children's Bureau, has made and is making continually investigations as to the effect of child labor in all walks of life; and if the Senator from Iowa will get the reports of the head of the bureau he will find that the last report states positively that there is duplication of the work not only in that department but in other departments of the Government.

I want to say further, if the Senator will permit me, that there is no question but that there is duplication. Everybody admits it. The departments admit it. The head of the Children's Bureau must certainly admit it, and, I think, did admit it, at least before the committee. The only question is as to which one of these departments or bureaus ought to do the work. The Senator from Iowa thinks that the Children's Bureau ought to do this work. What the Senate ought to do is to state positively, by action of the Senate, what bureau is going to do this work, give that bureau sufficient money to do it, and forever prevent any other department or bureau from doing the same work. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. KENYON. If the work is identical, of course that is true. Nobody wants duplication of work.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have the report here, and I can read it, but it is not necessary. They all admit that there is an overlapping of work, and we all know that there is; and what I should like to do is to have that overlapping cease.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if it is not done this year we ought to take it in hand early enough next year and see that it is stopped.

Mr. KENYON. There is no other side to that argument, of course. I simply state that the duplication is done by the other bureaus, and I say that on the authority of those who, I think, are well qualified to know.

I had not intended to take up so much time, Mr. President. I have here a great many figures and statistics, and a great deal of correspondence, but I am not going to take the time to read them. I just want to ask Senators, if they will, to read the recommendations which are found at the close of Miss Lathrop's report, on page 26, setting forth what she has asked for. I think I will ask permission to include that in my remarks. There is not very much of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RECOMMENDATIONS.

The bureau's most serious administrative embarrassment has been caused by lack of clerical service. This lack is a great handicap in the statistical division, as has been mentioned earlier. The unexpected extent of the baby-week celebration suddenly threw upon the bureau an amount of clerical work which compelled the postponement of regular work and caused unavoidable delays and some hardship. But aside from the emergency caused by baby week—an emergency which will exist again in the spring of 1917—the clerical service of the bureau proves to be inadequate for the volume of work turned in by the field service and entailed by the natural growth of the work carried on by correspondence.

Increases in the clerical staff have therefore been requested, carefully estimated to meet the needs of the bureau for the next fiscal year.

During the year the staff of the bureau has consisted of 76 persons, and the appropriation has been $164,640.

The work of the year leads to the recommendation of an increase of 57 persons for the staff, making the total staff now requested 133 persons. An increase of $187,520 in the appropriation is requested, making the total requested appropriation $352,160. A detailed analysis has already been submitted in the usual manner.

These increases would permit in general—

1. The continuance of the infant-mortality inquiry.
2. The development of the rural studies in maternal and child welfare.
3. The development of child-labor studies, especially with reference to occupational strain and its measure by accident records, and the studies rendered desirable by the Federal law.
4. The continuance and development of the studies of dependent, defective, and delinquent children, not including the suggested special study of needy children.
5. The establishment of the library service upon a proper footing.
6. The equipment of the statistical service to meet the requirements of the bureau.

7. The development of the exhibit material so that it could meet the legitimate demand.
8. The organization of an office clerical force adequate to meet the needs of the work in progress and of such other work as may develop during the year.

JULIA C. LATHROP, Chief.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator feel that we ought to amend this bill so that all of those recommendations can be taken care of?

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not.

Mr. SMOOT. Because, if that were the case, we would have to increase this bill by the sum of $187,000.

Mr. KENYON. I am not asking for that. I think, if we stay by what the House did, that is within the bounds of reason. That is less than Miss Lathrop asked. I thought, however, that these recommendations might be read with interest by the Senators.

I have no criticism, Mr. President, of anybody on the committee or anywhere else. I am glad to see the committees exercising economy. We have been concerned here, and are concerned in Congress, with questions of conservation—conservation of water power, conservation of forests, conservation of the soil—and we are all interested in those things; but no one of those equals in importance the conservation of the children of this country. I know that I am no more interested in that subject than the distinguished gentlemen who are on this committee; but I am in favor of any kind of legislation and large appropriations if they will help in any manner to relieve conditions in this country in such a way as to help bring roses into the cheeks of little babies, laughter into the lives of little children, and happiness into the homes of Americans. I believe that the work of this great bureau is more important than that of any other bureau in this Government to help bring about those results.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I think we should be very careful in the disbursement of public funds. It is possible that in some instances the work that is being done by the Children's Bureau, work of a similar character, is being prosecuted by another bureau; but I hardly think it is a duplication. I do not know of a bureau that is doing exactly the work that is being done by this one; and in the absence of absolute proof to that effect I am going to give it the benefit of the doubt, and oppose the amendment offered by the committee, which I am afraid, if it should be adopted, would in some way cripple or hinder the very great work designed to be accomplished by this function which has been created in the interest of humanity.

I regard the section of the bill under consideration as most important, for the reason that it deals with immortal stuff. The work to be accomplished by this item of appropriation not only affects vitally the welfare of the child in its pilgrimage through this world, but it does more than that; its influences and effects reach into eternity. We are not legislating for the present or the immediate future exclusively, but generations born a thousand years from to-day will be touched and affected by the influences that will grow out of this appropriation. I believe that ninety-nine ills out of every hundred with which the human race is afflicted are due to ignorance and poverty, for both of which man is responsible.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Harding	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Brady	Hitchcock	Newlands	Smoot
Brandegee	Hollis	Norris	Sterling
Bryan	Hughes	Oliver	Stone
Catron	Husting	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	James	Page	Thomas
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Pittman	Tillman
Clark	Jones	Poindexter	Vardaman
Culberson	Kenyon	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Cummins	Kern	Robinson	Walsh
Curtis	La Follette	Shafroth	Warren
du Pont	Lane	Sheppard	Weeks
Fernald	Lodge	Sherman	Williams
Fletcher	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Gronna	Myers	Smith, Md.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] owing to illness, and of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], who is absent on official business.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have been requested to state that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Man is the creature of heredity and environment, the embodiment of what his forefathers were and what he has absorbed from his surroundings. The generations that have passed from the stage of action are in a large measure responsible for the moral, mental, and physical characteristcs of the men and women who live to-day. The errors of the past are our most serious handicap. We may direct our acts and shape our own conduct but we can not measure the influences or the consequences which will flow from them. I believe in the eternity of ideas and the immortality of good and bad deeds.

When I observe the lightness with which certain of my colleagues consider this question, it fills me with apprehension. I regard this as one of the most important questions that has engaged the attention of Congress since I became a Member of this body. The most valuable thing beneath the stars is a human being. Its worth can not be measured in gold. In this Republic everything good or bad that enters into national or private life comes from the individual man. He is not only the source of all political power but he is also the source of all the wealth of the Nation. From the individuals who make up the citizenship of this great Republic, all of the just powers of Government are derived. Really the whole theory of the Government is directed to one single individual, namely, to you. And just how you act, just how you meet the duties of life, will determine very largely the point of view of the man who comes after you. If we could only grasp the thought and live by it that education—training—forms the common mind, and "as the twig is bent the tree's inclined," how much easier it would be for those who come after us to live. If we could only understand the great importance of dealing properly with this question, if we could comprehend the value of the child to the Nation and deal with it as a question of present personal interest to us as well as a question of national concern, not only for the present but for the eternal future, how much better it would be for all.

> You may talk of reformations of the economic plan
> That shall stem the social evil in its course;
> But the ancient sin of nations must be got at in the man;
> If you want to cleanse a river, seek the source.

In the early days of this Republic, when the vocation of our people was largely that of agriculture, when every man was an aggregation of atoms rather than as he is to-day, an infinitesimal atom of an infinite aggregation, when he lived close to nature and to nature's God, and absorbed from his environments health and hope, when he was more inclined to love his neighbor as himself, and was moved in all things by a spirit of altruism, it was very different from what it is to-day. The competition in the battle for existence was never quite so sharp as it is now. Time has changed and conditions have changed also. In the great congested centers, where the few own the wealth and the many live in poverty, in squalor and want, with all the moral filth which pollutes the atmosphere of the underworld, it becomes necessary that something of the nature or character proposed in this bill shall be done. Did it ever occur to the Senators that physical environment and debased hereditary tendencies will create a creature who finds it more difficult to do right than a person born and reared amidst more elevated and salutary environment finds it difficult to do wrong? Think of a child born of an immoral mother, from the loins of a debauched and brutalized father, the victims of the "social wants that sin against the strength of youth, and the social lies that warp up from the living truth," reared in the slime and indigence of the low quarters of the great cities, where the atmosphere is reeking with vice. Is it possible to grow strong, physically clean, morally erect men and women under such conditions? You can not sow the seeds of vice and hope to reap the flowers and fruits of virtue. Think of a fellow mortal fashioned on this horrible plan:

> Coarse, deformed, and misbegotten—more a devil than a man—
> Heir to sin and want and sorrow, born without a sense of shame;
> Stung by sharp, keen, fierce desires, burning in his blood with flame;
> Weak, unbalanced, and repulsive—reveling in sensual things;
> If he hath a soul within him, 'tis a soul that never sings—
> 'Tis a soul that hath no wings.
> He was born without the power or the impulse to forbear
> When the dumb, resistless forces of the cycles centered there;
> That which gave him life had given passions that impelled him here;
> Circled him with strong temptations from his birth cry to his bier.

Mr. President, I am in favor of economy in the administration of public affairs. I regard it as akin to crime for the Congress to misappropriate money extorted by taxation from the toiling millions of this Republic. The hundreds of millions appropriated for preparation for war is without justification or excuse, in my judgment. I believe we have a right to collect revenue from the people only to pay the expenses of the Government economically administered. I am profoundly mindful of the fact that our disbursements far exceed the Nation's income at the present time. We must economize; but, in the name of humanity, in the name of the Christ who said, "Suffer little children and forbid them not to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven," I protest we should not begin economizing by crippling the work of this department of our Government which deals with the very source of all that is good and bad in the Nation. I believe that the most acceptable service to God is service to man. I believe that the highest end of Government is the development of man, for if man be properly developed the Government will share his improvement, and the moral sentiments will write the laws of the land. I would not disparage that sense of prudence which lays away something for a rainy day, which puts away the products of vigorous youth and manhood to supply the wants of incompetent old age.

I glory in the strength of our great Republic, this Government which manifests the aggregate moral qualities and intellectual characteristics of a great people; but above and beyond all, as high as the sun hangs above the earth, I respect and honor the man, and I will consider of first importance his personal good. The salvation of one man outweighs the entire sum appropriated for the Children's Bureau.

Pointing to such, well might Cornelia say
When the rich casket shown in bright array,
"These are my jewels!" Well of such as he,
When Jesus spake, well might the language be,
"Suffer little ones to come to me."

I can not give my consent to the adoption of the amendment of the committee, for I fear it would cripple the work of this bureau. There may be defects in the management of the bureau; as to that I can not speak, but if there be any, then let us correct them; let us add to its efficiency rather than destroy it altogether by refusing to give it the necessary money with which to conduct its affairs. In dealing with this great problem let us not forget—

That childhood shows the man
As morning shows the day.

The Nation is engaged in a great work, and I for one shall lend a helping hand to those in charge of the bureau and wish them Godspeed in their every effort.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I voted against the bill establishing the Children's Bureau because, as I believed and understood, the very work that was expected to be done by the Children's Bureau was already being done by other departments and bureaus of the Government. I think that is equally true to-day. We are constantly duplicating not only the work that is done by the departments and bureaus of the Government, but we are duplicating by the work of the Government what is being done by the States, and are spending millions of dollars unnecessarily and that might just as well be thrown away.

Perhaps I am as much interested in the welfare of the children of this country as most people. I think I recognize as fully as almost anyone the obligation that rests on the Government of the United States to protect its people in their morals, in their health, and in their social relations. Therefore I am not disposed at any time to be overeconomical when it comes to a question of this kind. But I have had something to say in the Senate very lately about the extravagance of the Government in many directions. This is one of them.

Something has been said here about the work that has been done by the Children's Bureau in the State of New Hampshire, in one of its large cities. I suppose, unless New Hampshire is behind the times, she has a State board of health, a county board of health, and a city board of health, all of which have jurisdiction over that particular city. The Government of the United States has no jurisdiction over it whatever.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, he is correct in his suggestion. New Hampshire has a State board of health and a city board of health. I am not quite sure as to a county board of health, but we have an excellent health organization in the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. WORKS. In the State of California, that I have the honor to represent in part here, we have a very capable health organization. We have an excellent State board of health, a board of health that covers all the counties of the State separately, and also the cities of any particular size have health organizations.

Mr. GALLINGER. And, Mr. President, further responding to the suggestion of the Senator, I think in almost every town, what is called in the West a township, we have a board of health, three men appointed to look after health matters.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, so far as the work is to be done in the State of New Hampshire or in California or any other State, that is work which belongs to the State; it should be done by the State organization and at the expense of the State. The Government of the United States as a matter of fact has no right to go into the State for any such purpose as that. So far as it affects the interest of the particular city or the State it may be possible that the Children's Bureau would be justified in going into the city of Manchester, for example, to examine into the conditions there and make an investigation for the purpose of giving out information on the whole subject that might be beneficial. I concede that. But if anything practical is necessary to be done it can not be done by the Government, it must be done by either the city or the State authorities.

But let us come down to the conditions in the District of Columbia. Here in the District of Columbia we have what I think is a very capable board of health, with a very competent, skillful, energetic physician at the head of the organization that I think has been giving excellent service to the District. We have also in the District the Public Health Service. While it is doing most of its work on the outside in the States it is allowing the District of Columbia to be neglected, the only territory over which it has real jurisdiction. In addition to that we have dealing with this question the Department of Labor that I know by an investigation that took place before the District Committee, of which I am a member, has been giving most careful attention and making a most careful investigation into industrial conditions and the condition of the children in the District and the women who are employed at service in the District. All of this is covered by the Department of Labor, and I think very thoroughly and very capably covered.

But what is the condition in the District of Columbia, Mr. President, with all these forces that should be at work, if they are not? We have places in the District of Columbia that are a disgrace to this country. I have called attention to it time and again, and I feel like calling attention to it whenever I have the opportunity. What are these people doing, the Children's Bureau or the Public Health Service or any of these organizations, for the children who live in those places? I believe in doing something more than merely taking and publishing statistics, making an investigation and dealing theoretically with these important questions. I believe they ought to be dealt with practically, not theoretically.

Mr. President, all this may be done, it may be capably done, it may be thoroughly and competently done, by the Children's Bureau. If so, that work should be transferred to the Children's Bureau so that it might be done by that bureau, and by it alone. There is no reason why it should be done by three different departments or bureaus of the Government, duplicating the work that is to be done. There is not any excuse for it at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to contend that the Children's Bureau is duplicating work?

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And that this appropriation covers work which has been done by some other department?

Mr. WORKS. I am not so sure about this appropriation, I will say to the Senator; I am speaking generally about conditions. I am not so much opposing this appropriation as I am attempting to call the attention of the Senate to the conditions as they exist. What this particular appropriation covers I am not so sure about.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator the item shows what it is and that it is already covered.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator show that the work for which this appropriation is proposed is now being done by some other department?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is being done through the board of health. They have issued circulars showing that they do this same kind of work.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I do not want to have a duplication. I am very much in favor of the bureau, and I am at a loss to find proof of its duplication.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is easily shown.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina what he says about this duplication. Is it not the truth that the Children's Bureau was doing this work before the Department of Health or the Board of Education ever commenced doing any of this particular work?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President; my recollection is that they were doing work of this kind before the Children's Bureau.

Mr. WORKS. That is precisely the ground on which I voted against the Children's Bureau bill. If I had not supposed that this work was being done, which I think exceedingly important work, I should have never voted against the Children's Bureau bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the reason why I voted against it at the time. The Senator may remember that he and I differed about the kind of work that was going to be done then. I am now talking about this particular appropriation of $72,000.

Mr. KENYON. This particular work which is being done by the Children's Bureau was commenced by the Children's Bureau, and if there is any duplication it comes from this other department.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. The law creating the Department of Labor provides—

That the Secretary of Labor shall investigate and report to Congress a plan of coordination of the activities, duties, and powers of the office of the Secretary of Labor with the activities, duties, and powers of the present bureaus, commissions, and departments, so far as they relate to labor and its conditions, in order to harmonize and unify such activities, duties, and powers, with a view to further legislation to further define the duties and powers of such Department of Labor.

Here is a letter from the Secretary of Labor dated January 9, 1917, in which department the bureau is located, from which I quote to the Senator this paragraph:

Another relationship, somewhat along the same line, exists with reference to the parallel activities of the Public Health Service and the Children's Bureau. The nature of this overlapping in the same fields of endeavor is of such a character that there is practically no limit to the duplication and resultant likelihood of confusion, unless there is complete and harmonious adjustment of the respective activities.

Here is a file of pamphlets gotten out showing the action taken by this department. As I understand the Senator from Iowa, his point is that there is no duplication in this particular item shown, but it says "especially to investigate the question of infant mortality." That general language was put in there, and when you find out what they are going to do with this appropriation of $72,000 it is for the employment of 57 more clerks to stay here in Washington with the 76 they now have. Here are pamphlets gotten out periodically by the Public Health Service for which an annual appropriation of a quarter of a million dollars is made, and all the work that is proposed to be done by this increased force is this same character of work.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRYAN. Let me read——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I do not yield the floor. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. BRYAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield further?

Mr. WORKS. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Florida, but he is making a very good speech that I would rather have him make in his own time.

Mr. BORAH. He is making a good one. Perhaps I am in fault, because I induced him to make it.

Mr. BRYAN. The question arose as to whether the Health Department was doing this work before the bureau was created. The Children's Bureau took the work away. It had been doing it long before that bureau was created. The appropriations have continued for it, and they are much larger than the appropritions that have ever been made to this particular bureau, and that is what the Secretary of Labor says, in whose department is this bureau.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. The Secretary of Labor does not say in anything the Senator has read that the Children's Bureau is duplicating the work. The work of the Health Bureau has reached over undoubtedly and done some of the same work the Children's Bureau has been doing, but as to this particular kind of work I will say, and I am going to put the document in the RECORD to prove it, I think that it initiated the particular kind of statistics investigations that I have been referring to, by the Children's Bureau, and there is no other bureau that has ever carried on this particular kind of work.

Mr. BRYAN. I will wait until the Senator shows that and then I will answer him.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not suggesting any lack of confidence in the head of the Children's Bureau nor the bureau itself. I have serious objections to appropriations for this purpose. One of them is that the work is already being done by other departments or bureaus of the Government and the other is that this money is not applied for practical purposes. I should like to see something practical done here in the District of Columbia. Instead of going about and examining these places and making up statistics and sending them out to the country, I should like to see this money spent to wipe out those places and put an end to them, so that it will not be necessary to investigate them. Here we are appropriating thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars for the purpose of going into the States and making investigations, when we are leaving these cesspools of vice and degradation and disease existing and flourishing right here in the Capital of the country.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have given the same appropriation they had last year, exactly. Instead of investigating in the District of Columbia, they go to Manchester and one or two other towns. As the Senator says, they could take this same appropriation that they have now and do the work next year the Senator asks be done, because we give them the same amount of money. Here is the place to do it, as the Senator says, and why do they not do it, instead of going to Manchester, when they have a board of health there, and they are doing the same work that is being done in the State of New Hampshire?

Mr. WORKS. I can tell the Senator why they do not do it. It is simply because his committee and the Congress of the United States are not willing to appropriate money enough to do it with.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have appropriated the money.

Mr. WORKS. Congress is responsible for the condition of these slums in the District. There would have to be direct legislation to wipe out these things completely in order to make the appropriations effective. That is what Congress is not doing. If the Senator would take up some of the propositions I have suggested, and some of them are covered by bills that I have introduced in the Senate for the purpose of tearing out the inside of these courts and inhabited alleys and constructing on their sites sanitary buildings for those poor people, then we would be doing something practical, and it would be of some benefit.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think that is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations? It is the duty of his committee. If his committee will report out a bill to do this work, then the committee that makes the appropriation will provide the money. We have given the board of health millions of dollars for this sort of work. The board of health is getting $100,000 and more. Report out a bill from your committee. The Committee on Appropriations has nothing to do with legislation. We provide the money. When Congress passes a law for a certain thing to be done, then we give the money.

Mr. WORKS. I hope the Senator will remember that promise when these bills are passed through the District Committee, as they should be.

Mr. OVERMAN. We are compelled to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, fully sympathizing with the views which the Senator from California has expressed, I want, for the purpose of emphasizing one matter, to call attention to the fact that on at least three different occasions the Committee on the District of Columbia has reported out a bill that I introduced, and it was passed by the Senate, establishing a home for feeble-minded children in the District of Columbia, but it never has become a law. I think the Children's Bureau might well take up that activity for the purpose of ascertaining how many States have an institution of that kind. We have one in New Hampshire; but we are permitting these poor creatures to roam around the District of Columbia, partly idiotic, immoral many of them, and then they are trying to save the children who come into the world from that class of people.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it does not require the expenditure of any money for the purpose of an investigation to discover the conditions that exist in the District of Columbia. I am not an expert myself; I have not made up any statistics on the subject; but I have been through these slums and I know what are the conditions. After visiting and going through these places for a day I was sick at heart to realize what the conditions were and the neglect of this great Government to correct those conditions.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator says I think that the Children's Bureau has done nothing at all in the District of Columbia, or at least has done it only in part.

Mr. WORKS. I did not say it had done nothing. I do not know what the Children's Bureau has done.

Mr. KENYON. I simply call the Senator's attention to one—it may not be large—among the studies and publications of the Children's Bureau:

No. 2. Mental Defectives in the District of Columbia: A brief description of local conditions and the need for custodial care and training.

That is a pamphlet of 39 pages, issued in 1915. That is one of the bureau's publications and one of its studies. So they have paid some little attention, at least.

Mr. WORKS. It is a good thing to make those studies, and I wonder what the Children's Bureau has done to aid the legislation that was introduced by the Senator from New Hampshire to better those conditions by establishing a home for these feeble-minded and unfortunate people.

Mr. BORAH. That is something which the Children's Bureau could not do.

Mr. WORKS. They can recommend it. I have never heard that a bill of that sort was passed. I think one of the things that should be done by the Children's Bureau would be to make this investigation and to recommend to Congress what legislation seems to be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the Children's Bureau.

I think one of the difficulties about the Children's Bureau is that it is trying to do pretty much everything else except that for which it was organized; going into the question of widow's pensions and various other things that ought to have no connection with the work of that bureau at all.

If that work could be separated, Mr. President, so that the work of the Children's Bureau could be confined to the condition of the children and to their benefit, and take it away from other departments of the Government, then I could see why these appropriations ought to be made for the purpose of carrying on that work; but so long as at least three different bureaus are doing exactly the same thing, and appropriations are being made for all of them to triplicate the work, it seems to be unreasonable, and that it ought not to be done.

Mr. President, I have not said this in any sense in antagonism of the Children's Bureau, or in antagonism of any efforts that may be made by any bureau of the Government to better the condition of the children of this country—far from it—but the Government of the United States ought in the first instance to keep itself within its own jurisdiction and not be doing the work that belongs to the States. Then, again, it ought not to be doing it by three bureaus doing exactly the same thing, but it ought to be confined to one of them. For that reason I think it is a wise thing to begin to curtail these appropriations.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the item under discussion reads as follows:

To investigate and report upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially investigate the questions of infant mortality, $72,120.

In the official estimates the Children's Bureau asked for $70,520. The House committee declined to allow that amount or any part of it. When the bill reached the House, however, the language which I have read was added, together with a lump-sum appropriation.

I think, in the first place, it would be well for Senators to understand what was going to be done with the $70,520 asked for before the committee. It was to be spent in the employment of 57 more clerks in Washington. That bureau now has 76 clerks. They want an expert on research at $2,000. They have no such office now. They now have 27 special agents, and they want 13 more. They want an administrative clerk. They have none. They have 2 clerks of class 3, and they want 5; they have 4 clerks of class 4, and they want 8; they have 5 clerks of class 2, and they want 11; they have 18 clerks of class 1, and they want 25; they have 10 clerks at $1,000 per annum each, and they want 17 more; they have 1 copyist, and they want 4 more; they have 1 messenger, and they want an assistant messenger.

Much of what has been said would lead one uninformed to believe that this appropriation was principally for the benefit in a practical way of child diseases. These people will stay right in Washington, and the clerks will be drawing clerks' salaries. I do not think it makes much difference whether that work, if it is being done at all, is being done by a set of clerks in the Public Health Service or by a set of clerks in the Children's Bureau. The work done is the publication of pamphlets.

Here [exhibiting] are some pamphlets gotten out by the Public Health Service. Let us see if there is any duplication. The Secretary of Labor says that the duplication is almost without limit. I suppose he knows as much about it as does the chief of the bureau under him. I read his own language in the time of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], and I will now read it again. The nature of this overlapping between the Public Health Service and the Children's Bureau "in the same fields of endeavor is of such a character that there is practically no limit to the duplication and resultant likelihood of confusion unless there is complete and harmonious adjustment of the respective activities."

Has the Public Health Service taken away the work of the Children's Bureau? The Senator from Iowa says not at all, that it has been doing that work for years. Now, let us see if they touched upon the question of infant mortality, that this amendment placed in the bill on the floor of the other House over the objection of the committee, is intended to reach. I hold in my hand some pamphlets which have been issued by the Public Health Service. One of them is entitled "The Care of the Baby."

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator give me the dates of those pamphlets?

Mr. BRYAN. This pamphlet is dated December 19, 1913.

Mr. LANE. Of what bureau?

Mr. BRYAN. This pamphlet was issued by the Public Health Service.

Mr. KENYON. After the Children's Bureau was established?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; after the Children's Bureau was established.

Mr. KENYON. Has the Senator any pamphlet issued by the Bureau of Public Health before the Children's Bureau was established?

Mr. BRYAN. I do not think I have any here; but I think there is no doubt pamphlets were issued, and have been issued for years.

Mr. KENYON. I am always ready to accept what the Senator from Florida says.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, I am not sure of that.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator say that the Bureau of Health made investigations upon these subjects before the establishment of the Children's Bureau?

Mr. BRYAN. I will say they had authority to do so. I do not know whether or not they published pamphlets on these subjects before that time, but undoubtedly they are doing it to-day under the appropriation of a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. KENYON. I am not denying that they may be doing some of that work to-day and that there is duplication; but I say they are doing the duplication.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me read from some of these pamphlets, to see if there is duplication. Here is one on the "Physical Care of Rural School Children"; here is another, entitled "Diphtheria: Its Prevention and Control"; another one is "Contagious Diseases: Their Prevention and Control in Children's Institutions."

Mr. KENYON. I want to ask if the Senator claims that the report on the subject of diphtheria is in any way a duplication of the work of the Children's Bureau?

Mr. BRYAN. Does that disease not affect the mortality of the children?

Mr. KENYON. That is not the kind of work the Children's Bureau is doing.

Mr. BRYAN. Now, if the Senator will merely wait a moment, I think there is almost positive proof in this pamphlet that the Public Health Service were engaged in this work before the Children's Bureau was established, because the pamphlet from which I last quoted was dated "April 11, 1913"; and if they had been authorized to do it, they could have done it. If they had not been doing it before the Department of Labor was created, they would have had no fund for this work. The fact that their report was here on April 11, 1913, shows that they were engaged in that work at the time of the establishment of the Department of Labor, which I believe was established before the Children's Bureau was established.

Mr. KENYON. That is, the investigation of diphtheria, the investigation of diseases in schools, and matters of that kind?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; in children's institutions.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, diseases are all over the country, but that is not the work the Children's Bureau is doing. I tried to point that out.

Mr. BRYAN. Here is a pamphlet on "Infantile Paralysis: What Is Known of Its Causes and Modes of Treatment," which was issued in 1916; here is another on that subject, "Present Knowledge of Its Causes and Manner of Spread," issued just a few months later. Here is one entitled "Mental Examination of School Children: The School as a Factor in the Mental Hygiene of Rural Communities." Another is on "Whooping Cough: Its Nature and Prevention," a popular discussion of a widespread and dangerous disease for which familiarity has bred contempt. Is not that duplicating the work of the Children's Bureau?

Mr. LANE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not take these pamphlets away.

Mr. LANE. I intend to quote from them. I will say, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Florida as to this work being a duplication, that it absolutely is not; it has no more to do with it than it has with the making of hats.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from Oregon can explain all that later.

Mr. LANE. I am going to do so.

Mr. BRYAN. Here is another pamphlet on "Measles." The Senator can explain that when he gets to it.

Mr. LANE. I will do so.

Mr. BRYAN. Here is another one on "Scarlet Fever: Its Prevention and Control"; another on "Sewage-Polluted Water Supplies in Relation to Infant Mortality." I suppose that has nothing to do with it.

Mr. LANE. Not a bit.

Mr. KENYON. What is the date of that report?

Mr. BRYAN. It is dated 1912. What I have read answers the Senator's question whether these officials were engaged in that work before the Children's Bureau was established. Here is a pamphlet of 36 pages, published at the Government Printing Office, entitled "Heat and Infantile Mortality," by the United States Public Health Service, in 1913; the date not otherwise given. "Malaria: Lessons on its Cause and Prevention for Use in Schools."

I am ready now to state to the Senator that that work has been going on in the Public Health Service since 1908.

Mr. KENYON. To just what does the Senator from Florida refer? My attention was diverted for moment.

Mr. BRYAN. I refer to this same character of work.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, yes; as to the investigation of diseases.

Mr. BRYAN. The work that the Secretary of Labor says duplicates the work of the Children's Bureau.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Secretary say that that work was duplicated before or that that work was carried on before the establishment of the Children's Bureau? I am not contending that there has not been some duplication since that time, but I am contending that it is the Department of Health which is doing the duplication.

Mr. BRYAN. I suppose, of course, there could not have been a duplication as between these two branches of the service before the Children's Bureau was established.

Mr. KENYON. I know that; but the Secretary of Labor in no place, as I understand, says anything about the character of the work having been carried on before the establishment of the Children's Bureau; he merely says the duplication is now going on. It is undoubtedly true that it is going on to some extent.

Mr. BRYAN. Let us see. I will read a little further from what the Secretary says. By the way, it develops another duplication when we come to read it. He says:

> One instance of distinct overlapping occurs in reference to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. This circumstance appears to be due to the broad authority vested in the Public Health Service to investigate the "diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof" (act approved Aug. 14, 1912; 37 Stat., 309). As the Bureau of Labor Statistics is charged with acquiring and diffusing useful information upon subjects connected with labor (act approved June 13, 1888; 25 Stat., 182), and as information regarding occupational diseases and the conditions influencing their propagation is clearly a subject connected with labor as well as with the general classification of the "diseases of man," the Bureau of Labor Statistics of this department and the Public Health Service of the Treasury Department are charged, at least to this extent, with similar duties. In order to prevent confusion and duplication of effort, coordination of the functions of these two branches of the public service should, in so far as they may overlap, be effected and consistently adhered to.
> The field of occupational diseases was occupied during a period of about seven years prior to 1912 by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, through its investigations into the hygienic conditions of cotton mills; of home work; of ventilation and general sanitary conditions of clothing shops; of diseases in the glass industry; of health of women in textile factories and laundries; of poisons in the industries; of tuberculosis among wage earners; of the health of wage-earning women in the pea canneries; of the hygiene of the painters' trade; of anthrax as an occupational disease, etc.
> Since 1912 the Public Health Service has carried its function with reference to the diseases of man into the field of occupational diseases. It can not be conducive to the good of the service in general to have two such Government establishments occupying identically the same field at one and the same time—

There he says "identically the same field."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, are the two bureaus referred to in the Department of Labor?

Mr. BRYAN. The Bureau of Labor Statistics is in the Department of Labor. The Public Health Service is under the Treasury Department.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator which bureaus he refers to as overlapping? Does he refer to the Public Health Service and the Bureau of Labor or the Children's Bureau?

Mr. BRYAN. I will read it again. He is making a general statement now, and says:

> It can not be conducive to the good of the service in general to have two such Government establishments occupying identically the same field at one and the same time, and it would appear that in so far as the functions of the Public Health Service relate to labor and its conditions, as is the case with reference to occupational diseases, they should be correlated and coordinated with those of the Department of Labor. In their medical or scientific aspects occupational complaints should doubtless be within the field of the Public Health Service, but just as certainly they should be within the jurisdiction of the Department of Labor in their industrial bearing, this phase of the matter being popular rather than scientific, and tending to promote the welfare of the wage earners who are or may become subject to ailments peculiar to certain trades and occupations. The logical conclusion is that neither branch of the public service should be in absolute control with reference to investigating them and publishing the results. The concluding recommendation in this report will, if adopted, prevent any harmful overlapping of functions and result in the utilization to the fullest extent of all such information and data that may be gathered for scientific and other purposes, so far as the same is useful in its more popular aspects.

Now we come to this:

> Another relationship, somewhat along the same line, exists with reference to the parallel activities of the Public Health Service and the Children's Bureau. The nature of this overlapping in the same fields of endeavor is of such a character that there is practically no limit to the duplication and resultant likelihood of confusion, unless there is complete and harmonious adjustment of the respective activities.
> Under the terms of the statute authorizing the establishment of the Children's Bureau (act approved Apr. 9, 1912, 37 Stat., 79) it is especially directed to investigate the questions of infant mortality, the birth rate, dangerous occupations, and accidents and diseases of children. The authority to investigate these same matters is likewise vested in the Public Health Service by the act approved August 14, 1912 (37 Stat., 309), which broadly covers the entire field under the term "diseases of man." As previously indicated in another connection, the function now under discussion is exercised by the Children's Bureau in a popular sense rather than from a medical or scientific viewpoint, but the means of attaining the respective ends necessarily lie along the same lines, and, as in the case of the contact between the Public Health Service and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and between the latter and the Children's Bureau, there should be absolute and positive means of preventing harmful overlapping of effort, and securing to all concerned the benefit of cooperative work in a movement which, up to a certain point, occupies a common field of investigation.
> Still another relationship of the Public Health Service to the Department of Labor is found in the work of medical inspection of aliens under the immigration laws (act approved Feb. 20, 1907, 34 Stat., 898, sec. 17).

The Secretary proceeds to give instances of duplication after duplication in the work of the department. Now, the Health Service, which is under the Treasury Department, is doing this work, and issuing the same kind of pamphlets. That is not unusual, and it is not confined to these two bureaus, one in the Treasury Department and one in the Department of Labor occupying the same field; many illustrations of the same thing can be found.

Here is the Yearbook for 1914, issued by the Department of Agriculture, is an article on "Clean water and how to get it on the farm," by the Agricultural Department. In the Treasury Department the Public Health Service issued a pamphlet entitled "Good water for farm homes"—an absolute duplication of work.

Here [exhibiting] is a bundle of pamphlets prepared and issued by various departments, showing the same condition to exist. That is what Congress had in mind when it directed the Secretary of the Department of Labor to submit to Congress a statement, such as the one from which I have quoted, pointing out duplications.

It seemed to the committee that there was no use of having the same work done by two separate bureaus. If Congress is going to assign this work to the Children's Bureau, it had better take it away from the Public Health Service; but certainly there ought not to be work right along the same line done by two different bureaus.

I understand that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], in view of this situation, proposes to offer an amendment before this bill is finally voted upon authorizing the President to investigate thoroughly into this question. Over a year ago the Committee on Appropriations, through the Bureau of Efficiency, began an attempt to eliminate this duplication of work, which confessedly exists now.

The amount asked for in this amendment is practically to enable the Children's Bureau to double its office force and to employ people to stay here in Washington, not to go about in the country to investigate children's diseases in the homes of the children, but to write learned pamphlets upon how those diseases can be prevented.

I have no doubt it is good work, but I have no doubt either that there are other pamphlets bearing upon the same subjects, probably equally as valuable, arriving at the same results, and giving the same instruction, issued by two or three or four of the departments here in Washington, not only upon this subject but upon many other subjects.

The committee has thought it wise not to continue this duplication at this time by retaining an item placed in the bill on the floor of the House without the recommendation of its Committee on Appropriations, which thoroughly investigated this question. I state to the Senate—and the House hearings will bear out the statement—that the increased clerical force which it is proposed to establish will be set up here in Washington, and only those designated as field agents, of which there are five, I think, will leave the city. That is the matter to which most of this day and a great part of yesterday has been given up. There will be only, I think, five employees who will leave Washington to go over the United States. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has pointed out that the States have health departments. I can see that it would be a benefit to them to have the results of the investigations of experts sent to them, but I do not think five employees outside of Washington are going to be of very much benefit to the boards of health in the various States. Now, I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to have possession for a few moments of the documents from which he quoted, I will promise him to return them. I would like to analyze them and would like also to see the report of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. BRYAN. Very well. I hand them to the Senator.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, this is a simple matter. There is not one of the diseases mentioned in these pamphlets which comes under the jurisdiction of the Children's Bureau. One of the pamphlets is entitled "Malaria; lessons in its cause and prevention." That is purely a medical subject. I want to say before I go further that for a few years I was a member of the State Board of Health of the State of Oregon, and I know pretty thoroughly what the duties of the bureau which operated under us were. I was appointed by my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] when he was governor of the State.

Malaria is due to a germ deposited by a mosquito. A member of the Children's Bureau would know nothing about its presence in the blood. It takes the work of a skilled microscopist and an analysis of the blood by a pathologist in order to ascertain the presence of the germ which causes malaria and which is transmitted to the human body by a certain species of mosquito. So investigations in regard to that disease are purely a medical function, and the Children's Bureau would have nothing whatever to do with it except to notice perhaps in their journeys around the country that a certain child or a number of children in a certain community were below par apparently in their physical condition, and then refer the matter to the health bureau to ascertain the cause of it. That bureau could then undertake the work in a manner which would enable them to ascertain the cause and to provide a remedy.

Another one of the pamphlets is entitled "Heat and infant mortality." That is a topic which is familiar to almost everyone. Physicians make reports to the health bureaus upon its effects upon foods, and so forth, during years when it is causing an excessive death rate.

Another one of the pamphlets is headed "Scarlet Fever: Its Prevention and Control." There would not be a member of the Children's Bureau allowed on the infected premises in the case of a disease of that kind. It would be against the law to enter the premises, and the person making the effort would be subject to arrest and fine if he or she attempted to make any investigation on the premises where the disease existed, for it is a highly infectious and dangerous disease, and the house where it is found, the members of the household, the nurse, and, of course, the child that has the disease are quarantined, and everybody else is forbidden to enter. Furthermore, it is rather a difficult disease at times to diagnose. It is hard to tell the difference between scarlet fever and measles and German measles or smallpox and other diseases of an eruptive character in their early stages.

In the same way the most infectious of known diseases is measles. Let there be measles in a house, and a child a quarter of a mile from that house may get it, because of the wind carrying the germs. The Children's Bureau would not be allowed on the premises in a case of that disease. They know nothing more about it than any ordinary citizen. It is also at times hard to diagnose, and yet it causes more deaths than any other children's diseases, not directly always, but because of its sequelæ—deafness, inflammation, and the production of pus in the mastoid cells behind the drum of the ear, for instance, which is a very dangerous disease.

Whooping cough is another disease which almost anyone can diagnose, but it is quarantined against, and in the case of that disease an agent of the Children's Bureau would not be allowed upon the premises, and that bureau would probably never have its attention called to it, except incidentally, when one of its employees might see a white flag floating from the front of a house, just as a red flag would indicate scarlet fever, a green flag measles, and a yellow flag smallpox.

Poliomyelitis, infantile paralysis, which has caused so many deaths, and which is so horrible in its effects, leaving children crippled and wretched all their lives, is a disease which should be purely under the care of scientists. They are now investigating it, trying to find the cause of it, and hunting all over the world for a remedy. The Children's Bureau would have nothing to do with it, nor would it have any means of making an investigation, nor would it be able to diagnose it if its inspectors saw it; how infectious it is we do not know at this time. The work of the two bureaus is distinct and separate, and the needs of the community are for both.

The representatives of the Children's Bureau go about, or should do so, investigating the general condition of children as it exists in different communities. They notice the general condition, and where it is within their ken, within their knowledge, they suggest, if there is a diseased condition, that the parents consult the board of health or their family physician or anyone who is particularly qualified to treat and handle the subject, to care for it, and therein is where they do good. The physician, the bureau of health, is kept busy making these diagnoses. In diphtheria every throat must be examined; specimens must be taken every day from the individual's throat and tested under the microscope, after breeding the germs which produce it, which work can not be done by the Children's Bureau.

Now, it is possible—and I do not gainsay it, for the reason that I do not know—that they are hiring too many clerks. But to the extent that they are doing their duty—and to that they should be confined—they are valuable to the community, and the bureau is of value. Their work does overlap in a way, and in a way they should work together and in harmony. They are necessary the one to the other, the one to bring the attention of the other bureau to the needs of the individual cases and to what is going on in a certain community; but we need the help of all of them if they do their full duty. The community needs it. We are paying the price in loss of life because we have not done more of it in the past.

You noticed here a while back, judging from all the talk we had upon the subject, that there was trouble down on the Mexican border; and we wanted to get men to go down there, volunteers and others, to help defend this country from inroads and raids made upon it by an irresponsible lot of Mexicans. Up to this time this Nation has been unable to secure enough volunteers to meet the call that was made upon them by the President. After a while the day will come when you will want to defend your property rights in this country. The lives of the children do not appeal very strongly to you, or to some of you, now, I notice. I will not say "you"; I do not wish to say anything unkind; but the people will want their property protected, and they will want men to do it, and they will want good, healthy men that will fight and are not afraid to go into a trench. They will not want, and we do not want, nor do we need, a lot of weaklings who can not or will not fight, for the very existence of the Nation may depend upon them. If you want such men, and healthy women to be mothers of such men, the Government must take a deep interest in their welfare when they are children, from the day they are born until they reach maturity, to surround them with conditions which will permit them to become healthy, strong, able-bodied men and women, and not a lot of weaklings. Babies that have been starved make adults who lack vitality and unfits them for even the ordinary walks of life, let alone the life-and-death struggles brought about by war.

Sixty-five per cent of the people of this country do not own the homes in which they live. They have no incentive, no sense of duty, to go out and fight to protect either your property or my property in which they have no interest, nor can they feel a patriotic sense of duty, for that matter, toward a country which neglected them in the most helpless period of their lives.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption at this point?

Mr. LANE. I will.

Mr. CLAPP. I have been necessarily out of the Chamber a good deal this afternoon, and the matter I have in mind may have been covered by the discussion; but as I understand the Senator, the function of the Children's Bureau does not include the ascertainment of the matters that are contained in the several reports of the United States Public Health Service submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. Is that right?

Mr. LANE. Well, it may be the duty of the Children's Bureau to call attention to some of them.

Mr. CLAPP. But it is not a medical bureau in any sense?

Mr. LANE. In no sense whatever.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to know what the Children's Bureau has to do, then.

Mr. CLAPP. To what extent, if any, is the medical profession employed in, or to what extent does it constitute a part of, the Children's Bureau?

Mr. LANE. To no extent whatever.

Mr. CLAPP. That was my understanding of it.

Mr. LANE. It has nothing whatever to do with it, except incidentally. If there happens to be an outbreak of typhoid fever in a community, or in some section of a community, or in some State, it then becomes the duty of the Health Bureau to ascertain the source; whether it is from the milk—it is always due to something taken into the alimentary canal—whether the water is impure, or some food supply, some vegetables, are infected, and to give notice to that community, and to set about to remedy it; and they have the power to do that. Of course, if the Children's Bureau ascertain that there exists a diseased condition before the attention of the Health Bureau is called to it, necessarily it would be their duty as good citizens, as ordinary humane persons, to call attention to it—to call the attention both of the public and of the Health Bureau to a condition that is killing off children or adults.

Mr. CLAPP. But not to deal with it from the medical standpoint?

Mr. LANE. Not to deal with it from the medical standpoint in any manner whatever.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, they say that with this $72,000 they want to employ 57 clerks in Washington. That is what they want the money for.

Mr. LANE. Well, Mr. President, they may need them. If they do, they are entitled to have them. If they do not need them, they should not be allowed them.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the point.

Mr. LANE. That is all there is to it. That is the answer to that query.

Mr. OVERMAN. They propose to send five agents abroad, which would be fair, and the balance of this $72,000 is for clerks in Washington. They have 76 clerks already, and they say they want 57 more clerks in Washington. These clerks in Washington are clerks of class 3 and class 4 and other classes—stenographers and typewriters and messengers. They will not do any work at all, unless they have plenty of work abroad, unless it is to write pamphlets or something like that. The committee could not see why we should refuse to give additional clerks to any other department and give these 57 clerks to this bureau. We want to be consistent all along, and we do not want to do anything to cripple this bureau at all. We propose to give them the same amount of money to carry on their work that they had last year; that is all. They, however, want 57 more clerks here in Washington. That is what the money is asked for.

Mr. LANE. It may be, Mr. President, that they have the same appetite for clerks that the Members of the Senate have. May be they have caught that disease from us.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right.

Mr. LANE. Of course, Washington is filled with clerks, and every department is loaded with them, and it may be that they are asking for more clerks than they are entitled to; and if they are that should be curtailed. The number of clerks should be cut down. But, as a general proposition, it is possible that they actually need these clerks for sending out information or making visits or writing communications containing instructions on the proper care and management of home affairs and the welfare of children which may become known to them and not ordinarily called to the attention of the Bureau of Health.

If they need them for such purposes, to the extent that they do need them they ought to be allowed to employ them; but several Senators have remarked here that the work of the Children's Bureau and the work of the Bureau of Health are identical. That is a mistake. They are confusing the subject. The members of the Health Bureau are kept busy analyzing sputum and all manner of disease products—cast-off products of disease—in order to ascertain what is the actual cause of the disease, and what the actual disease is, and with other duties of a specific character. They have their men at work at all times. The Children's Bureau, on the other hand, as I say, are looking out for the general welfare of the children, which the Bureau of Health do not have time to attend to, and are not to be called upon to do, except as it comes to their notice, and then they act.

I have done too much of this work; I have been connected with it too long not to realize its value. I have had opportunity to know something of it, and I never had an idea that anyone could possibly connect the two departments as duplicates. They do, and should, correlate and work together; and if they overlap it should be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, if you please, and the Secretary of Labor to sit down together and, taking members of each bureau, place the work where it properly belongs, so that they may not work out of harmony. We meet with duplications of work every day in all of the affairs of the Government—one department encroaching upon another, duplication of work. That should be abolished. But I would be averse to coming down with a harsh hand upon a bureau which holds within its power, if it does its duty, the very fate of the Nation and future generations. I should be reluctant to begin strict and rigid economy with that bureau until after I had gotten my hand upon a lot of useless expenditures, amounting in the aggregate expenditures of this Nation to 40 cents on the dollar—not $72,000 nor $100,000, but hundreds of millions—with the affairs of the people neglected and inequality and injustice visited by the very Government itself upon the mass of the people of the country.

We are going to build up no nation which will last in the history of time, no nation which can properly defend itself from aggression, until we turn about and begin to take interest in the very least of our citizens, and follow them from their cradles to their graves with the ordinary, reasonable care which they deserve at the hands of a government which rules over them. There will be no army of volunteers to defend it in time of need upon which to rely, and you will drive them into the trenches with bayonets in their hands to fight back with, perhaps.

Mr. CLAPP. They will not be worth driving, either.

Mr. LANE. No; they will not be worth driving. As I said yesterday, we do not want a condition of affairs in this country where the down-and-out class of men who have nothing to eat are forced to sell the blood out of their veins to some gentleman who has been eating too many $500 dinners, perhaps, to save his life, which is of less value or of not greater value to the country, perhaps, than the other man's life—blood at, say, $25 a pint. We do not want citizens of this country who have to sell their blood for a living, if we can avoid it—no! The present market price for human blood is too cheap, and the lives of babies are also held too cheap, and they have always been held too cheap, whereas the price of other more material things has been too high.

It would be better to cut expenses somewhere else. I would give the Secretary of the Treasury instructions, and the Secretary of Labor, and the head of the Health Department to get together, in consultation, to devise a means to remedy any overlapping, and to pare expenses down to where they properly belong; but I would not let one baby die if it could be prevented. They die by thousands from neglect, not after they get into the hands of the Health Bureau and the physicians, but before. They are forced into their hands when it is too late to save their lives.

Did you ever see a starving baby, a baby that was starving to death? I have seen a baby three months old that only weighed three pounds, and you could put it into your pocket. When a baby is dying of starvation the skin shrivels and sinks back onto its bones, and the wrinkles come over it until it looks like a mummy that has been dead 4,000 years—the most pitiful looking, little old, withered object, with brown skin, that you ever laid your eyes on. It is too late to save it then. I have seen others, by the dozen, that have been starved until they could hardly digest a particle of food, picked up, built up, tenderly nourished, until they became one of the most rosy-cheeked children going to school, and I have followed them in their life history on to high school, and I have seen them since they have had children of their own. I know them, and I know what it means to a child to take it at a critical time, with motherly care and good food and under the advice of a sensible physician, or if it is necessary the board of health, and build it into a citizen of whom the country may be proud. But the little graves lie by thousands and hundreds of thousands on the other side of the line.

I would not stint here. I would be a little generous here; but next year I would make them come with the facts, the actual facts, so that we could be just without being generous.

Justice is all that the people need, all that they are entitled to. Children are so helpless, a baby is so helpless that it always appeals to me. I could with much pleasure do things to some full-grown people whom I know, but not to a child—not to a helpless child.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will my friend, the Senator from Oregon, permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LANE. I will.

Mr. GALLINGER. We all bow to the Senator—I certainly do—in knowledge of medical matters. I have listened to the Senator's picture of the starving baby. Mr. President, a baby usually starves because it does not digest and assimilate its food. What can the Children's Bureau do for a baby of that kind? It is in the hands of a physician and a nurse and the mother.

Mr. LANE. Most of those children die of intestinal and acute digestive troubles. They die for the reason that they have not been fed cleanly or properly from the beginning of their lives, until their stomachs and alimentary canals become unable to digest the curd in the milk of a cow. You can skim the milk of a cow—they do it in Germany—take off the cream, and by certain processes of treatment, with one or two slight chemicals added to it, produce a substance which is as hard as ivory and makes a better billiard ball than ivory—makes the finest knife handle in the world—better than bone. Here is one of them in my hand. A baby can not digest it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I bow again to the Senator's superior knowledge; but at the same time some of the rest of us have reared children, and some of us have treated children. I want to ask the Senator in all good conscience, when a baby of that kind, refusing to digest and assimilate its food in the hands of a competent physician, a nurse, and a mother, can not be relieved, what can an expert or a clerk or a field examiner of the Children's Bureau do for that baby?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, when they get so badly off as that under the fostering care of a physician who will allow them to be fed on that kind of a diet, I will acknowledge that very little can be done for them. They die by thousands, and the doctors have slain their thousands by improper methods of feeding. I am willing to concede it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to say a single word.

I voted against the original appropriation for the Children's Bureau because at that time it was demonstrated that we had made a large appropriation for the Department of Labor, and the very questions involved in the bill that is before us were under investigation at that time. I was misunderstood as to my purpose in casting that vote, and I paid the penalty, so far as it could be inflicted upon me, by misrepresentations that were scattered broadcast over my State. Since then I have voted for appropriations for this bureau, recalling the fact that when it was established we were told that the $25,000 we appropriated would probably be sufficient to carry it on, and we have increased that by six or seven fold up to the present time.

I am not very clear in my mind as to the proposed appropriation that the committee has recommended shall be stricken from the bill. I have in my hand the fourth annual report of the Chief of the Children's Bureau, a most estimable woman, who perhaps knows more about children than most women who are not mothers do, and I notice that they want to increase their staff by 57 persons. They say that their staff to-day is 76 persons. The appropriation has been $164,640; but they recommend an increase of 57 persons in the staff, making the total staff now requested 133 persons; and an increase of $187,520 in the appropriation is requested, making the total requested appropriation $352,160.

It is possible that that amount of money can be well expended by this bureau, but when we stop to reflect, as the acting chairman of the committee has pointed out, that this added appropriation is largely for the purpose of giving them an increase of 57 persons to work in the office, wherever it may be, in the city of Washington, it raises a query in my mind as to the desirability or necessity of it.

In looking over this report it occurs to me that this bureau are engaged in some activities that they might well lay aside. For instance, one of their great activities seems to be to establish a "national baby week." They are sending out publications, and doubtless are writing thousands and thousands of letters, trying to arouse people to the necessity of having a baby week not only in the cities—I believe a few cities have succumbed to their appeals—but a national baby week. That does not appeal to me as a very desirable thing. It does not appeal to me that we ought to appropriate money for that purpose.

Under the head of "National baby week," the bureau say that they have prepared a pamphlet entitled "Baby Week Campaigns"; but concerning the work in this direction they further say:

> There are many million fathers and mothers in the United States, including many of the best educated fathers and mothers, who have never read a statistical table, and never will; yet hidden within the figures of the bureau's reports on infant mortality, the reading of which they will successfully evade, the stern facts about the dangers which beset American babies can be found.

So, admitting that millions and millions—I do not know how many millions—but millions upon millions of intelligent fathers and mothers refuse to read their publications about "baby week" and about babies, yet they are continuing to publish them, and sending them broadcast over the country, actually duplicating the work that the Public Health Service and our boards of health of the several States, to a very considerable extent, are doing.

Mr. President, there is a very large duplication of work. I do not know whether we ought to put it all in the hands of the Children's Bureau or not; but it is evident to me that we ought not to be making appropriations for the Public Health Service, for the Department of Labor, and also for the bureau which is now under consideration. The duplication of work in this direction, however, is not the only duplication that we have under our present system of Government. It is really a condition of things that ought to be corrected in some way.

It seems to me, Mr. President, in view of the fact that some of us are trying to economize, that the committee should be sustained in this matter. If I were as much of a partisan as I am credited with being in certain quarters, I would be in favor of the most liberal and profligate expenditures, so that our good Democratic friends might have more trouble in the near future than they have now in evolving a method of meeting the impending deficit in the Federal Treasury. But by nature I am something of an economist, and I do not want to waste money, even though it might make some trouble for my political opponents.

Mr. President, the committee of which I chance to be a member have looked this matter over carefully. They have not taken any snap judgment about it. They discovered that the committee in the House of Representatives—if I may be permitted to refer to that—reported a bill giving this bureau the same appropriations that they had last year; and those appropriations were pretty liberal. They were six or seven times the amount that was originally appropriated for this bureau. They gave them 76 persons and an appropriation of $164,640.

When the bill came to the floor of the House of Representatives—and I presume I can properly refer to that, because it is a matter of public record—a motion was made to increase the appropriation. That body, as we sometimes do here, legislates with a very small proportion of the Members present, and the increase was put on the bill. It came to the Senate. The Committee on Appropriations looked it over very carefully, and in their judgment it was deemed wise to give the bureau the same amount of money that it had last year. Inasmuch as this is a time when we are refusing added appropriations in other departments and bureaus of the Government; when we are denying, or an attempt is being made to deny, a little additional help to the underpaid employees of the Government in the departments; when we are cutting salaries to the bone so far as we can, the committee thought it was wise, and not parsimonious or niggardly or hostile to the bureau, to hold the appropriation where it was last year.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. KENYON. Inasmuch as the Senator has referred to the action on this matter in the House of Representatives, I assume it must be in order. I will ask him to state, if he will, the vote on this matter, if it would be proper.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say frankly that I do not know what the vote was.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator will agree, then, will he not, that the vote for this additional appropriation was overwhelming?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know. I have not examined it. I took the fact from the statement made by the acting chairman of the committee. I have not examined the debate or the report. But, however that may be, Mr. President, we are charged with a duty here that we can not shirk; and disclaiming absolutely any other feeling than one of warm interest in this bureau and a desire to have it properly sustained by adequate appropriations, it does seem to me that this is not quite the time, nor do I believe there is any urgent need, for almost doubling the force and almost doubling the appropriations that this bureau had last year.

For that reason, Mr. President, I shall vote to sustain the action of the committee when the question is presented to the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Let me ask the Senator, does he remember how many years ago this bureau was established? I remember the appropriation of $25,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps the acting chairman of the committee can state the date. I do not have it at hand.

Mr. OVERMAN. I remember the Senator from New Hampshire and I both fought it because we thought it would be a duplication of work, and it turns out that that has been the case. The appropriation then was $25,000. It must have been six years ago.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it was about six years ago.

Mr. BRYAN. It was in 1912.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was about five years ago.

Mr. WARREN. That justifies my remembrance. It seems to me that the bureau started in that way, and it was furnished with an increased appropriation as fast as they could properly assimilate it and use it with good economy. With all fealty to the object that was started and proceeded with, it seems to me we had better go a little too slow than a little too fast, especially now when we are short on money and long on appropriations.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was interested to-day in the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], whose great interest in this subject I recognize and appreciate, when he called attention to the fact that they were protecting hogs in certain parts of the country. It reminds me of what we hear frequently in this Chamber when some appropriation, it may be small in amount, is being discussed for some humanitarian object; we are twitted by certain Senators with the suggestion that we made an appropriation of a large sum for the purpose of suppressing hog cholera. But when that statement is made it is never coupled with a statement as to the large amount of money, the hundreds of thousands of dollars, we are appropriating every year to the Public Health Service and to other activities in that direction for the care of human beings. We have not been parsimonious in that regard, and not any of us, I am sure, put the interests of property in live stock, cattle, and hogs, and horses above our interests in the men and women and children of the country. I have always voted for very liberal appropriations for the Public Health Service and all activities of that kind. I shall always continue to do that, and I shall certainly not be other than mindful of my duty so far as the Children's Bureau is concerned, because I believe it ought to be sustained and that it ought to have the sympathy of all of us. But when it comes to almost doubling up the force of that bureau at a single swoop and almost doubling the appropriation at this particular time, I do not feel, Mr. President, that either my duty to myself, to my constituents, or to the children of the country warrants it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I hope that what I shall say on this subject will not be considered in any way as a reply to my distinguished colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] or being due to a desire to engage in any controversy with him on this subject. I rose at the same time he did, intending to speak, but was very glad to yield precedence to him.

I realize, as the other Senators do, that the Committee on Appropriations have a very disagreeable as well as important task to perform, and they must act conscientiously; they must at times appear unsympathetic and a little hard-hearted toward appeals that are made to them. But possibly the fact that they have served frequently in that capacity and have grown used to denying appeals has made them seem a little callous to those of us who do not have to put the brakes on.

I made some remarks yesterday and the day before with reference to the appropriations for the Farm Loan Board. That complaint was not addressed to the functions that the committee were performing in supervising the expenditures of the Farm Loan Board. My remarks were addressed more to the fact that the committee had undertaken to put the brakes on that bureau before it had gotten fairly started and before the Committee on Appropriations could have sufficient information to act intelligently.

But this particular matter, the care of babies and children, is not, as my colleague says, one that does appeal in all its aspects to men. The mere mention of the term "baby week," the fact that they have in this country a baby week, is rather calculated to provoke a smile on the faces of men; and it is because the women of the country want to have child welfare more particularly under their direction, where it will be sympathetically treated as well as systematically treated, that they come here and ask us to allow them to continue the baby work and to continue it in their way.

The other department that is dealing with it is the Treasury Department, a place where they deal with hard facts and hard cash, and women can not expect to get a sympathetic handling of this important matter through the Treasury Department.

It is asked what good all this investigation does. My attention was arrested this afternoon during the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] by something that was said here in the Chamber by Mr. Lunn, of Schenectady, N. Y., who has been just elected to Congress and has the privileges of the floor. He asked what subject was up. He was informed, and then he told what they had done in Schenectady themselves. The mortality among the babies of Schenectady in 1912 was 137 per thousand.

The city took up that work itself and after investigating and applying remedies and incurring an expense of only $5,000 in four years the infant mortality was reduced from 137 per thousand to 76 per thousand, almost cut in half. Now, Schenectady has an enlightened and a progressive mayor and the city did this work for itself, but other cities, I will not say in any other part of the country, I will say in that part of the country, can not all be depended upon to look into these things for themselves, and that is one function of the National Government in these days.

I was impressed this afternoon to see that the one Senator who talked on State's rights was on the other side of the aisle. That brought to my mind the thought that the men who are asking for a strict construction of the Constitution and for State's rights as opposed to a centralized Government will usually be found in the minority opposed to those who are undertaking to do things. I think likely the historical alignment of the two great parties in this country came from the fact that it was the Federalists who first controlled and the opposition centered about strict construction.

However, I am not afraid of too much investigation on this subject. It is one that men do neglect; it is one we do not know about. We do consider it a woman's work to know about children and children's diseases.

It is only recently that children have come to be regarded as a national asset, instead of a burden. A healthy, strong, promising child is an asset; a puny, weak, sickly child is a burden to the community if not to its parents; and anything we can do here to direct the best thought of the Nation toward the children's movement will be attention well bestowed.

I was engaged last summer and fall in the West for several months in what I considered to be public work, and I was there brought in touch with the great western progressive movement, especially on the part of that body of fine women in Chicago who have done so much in school work and industrial work and in child work. I found that the one thing the present administration has done which appealed most strongly to those women and to the progressive spirit was the retention of Miss Julia Lathrop as the head of the Children's Bureau, and the very encouraging support the administration had given to that bureau. I was not aware of it before. I do not know where the Children's Bureau is in the city, but I think I am at fault for not knowing; I could easily find out. I was at fault for not knowing that the Children's Bureau is now conducting very important investigations in one of the cities in my own State.

It is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to point out duplications. None of us want money spent extravagantly, and the committee have performed a service in calling our attention to it here to-day. I can not conceive that the heads of two departments will permit in the future duplications of this sort to continue. But so far as selecting between the Treasury Department to look after the welfare of children and the Children's Bureau under the direction of this philanthropic, wise, and intelligent woman, I think we should support the House provision and vote down the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, so much has been said this afternoon about duplication that I desire to have read and placed in the RECORD a memorandum from Miss Lathrop covering, I think pretty clearly, that question. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

RELATION BETWEEN THE CHILDREN'S BUREAU AND OTHER GOVERNMENT BUREAUS WITH THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

When the Children's Bureau began operations in the autumn of 1912, I called upon the head of the Public Health Service to make sure that there was no duplication of work on the part of the Children's Bureau. I explained the bureau's purpose to undertake a study of the social and economic factors surrounding infant mortality. I was assured by the head of the Public Health Service that such a study had never been made, and that it would be valuable, and that the Public Health Service had no purpose to undertake it. It was also fully explained in the beginning to the Public Health Service that the bureau purposed publishing a series of popular pamphlets upon the care of children, beginning with one upon prenatal care. It was my distinct understanding that into this field of popular instruction the Public Health Service had no purpose to enter and cordially approved the work of the Children's Bureau. Cooperation was offered, and the pamphlet upon prenatal care profited by the advice of the Public Health Service. This subject was further discussed between Mrs. Max West and Dr. Kerr, of the Public Health Service. I append a memorandum made on October 29, 1912, which shows the attitude of the Public Health Service at that time.

A year later I learned by chance that the Public Health Service had in proof a popular pamphlet upon the care of babies. As the pamphlet of the Children's Bureau on infant care was then well under way, was much fuller than that of the Public Health Service, differed in presentation, and formed part of the series originally discussed with the Public Health Service, it was published as planned.

As a matter of fact, the call for this type of literature is so great that the Children's Bureau publications, and those of the Public Health Service jointly, are not sufficient to meet the demand. The regrettable circumstance is that it should be made to appear that the Children's Bureau deliberately duplicated work undertaken by the Public Health Service, when in fact, although the subject was especially assigned to it by law, the Children's Bureau undertook no work without the fullest consultation with the Public Health Service, and the assurance that the Public Health Service had not done and did not purpose to do the same work.

WITH THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE AND THE BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

It should be noted, however, that a successful piece of cooperation had been carried on between the Public Health Service, the Bureau of Education, and the Children's Bureau. In a study of the feeble-minded in Delaware, in which the three bureaus have joined with the Delaware educational authorities, the Children's Bureau has made the social and family studies of the feeble-minded. The Public Health Service has furnished an expert for the mental examinations. I can not see how work could be more economically done. The Children's Bureau has never attempted to establish a service of medical experts upon feeble-mindedness. On the other hand it has a competent service of field agents. In this connection I inclose a preliminary summary of part of the Delaware report.

WITH THE CENSUS BUREAU.

The special statistical inquiries of the Children's Bureau are necessarily based upon census figures, and the bureau is under great obligation to the census authorities for invaluable cooperation. At the suggestion of Dr. Wilbur, vital statistician of the Census Bureau, the Children's Bureau has carried on in cooperation with the census for the last three years a continuous campaign for better birth registration in which thousands of volunteers have helped.

WITH THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The bureau has furnished large numbers of publications on the care of children for circulation by the county agents of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not myself want to take any more time. I think the debate is nearly finished as far as those who are opposed to the amendment are concerned, but there are one or two Senators who want to speak a little while and they are not prepared to go ahead to-night. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will let the matter go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope that will not be done. Surely we have given time enough to this one appropriation of $72,000. Most of it has been used by the opposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am informed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that he desires an executive session and when we get through it will be 6 o'clock. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] wants to speak on the pending amendment and perhaps others. Of course, I want to get along with the bill as fast as possible, and I am going to ask the Senate if we can not get through on Monday to have a night session.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will we not have time to-morrow?

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand we meet at half past 10 to-morrow to attend the funeral ceremonies. When we come back it may be 2 o'clock and we will not have a quorum and it will be impossible to get a quorum. A great many Senators wish to accompany the body to Arlington.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest that we can finish the speaking to-morrow afternoon whether we have a quorum or not. We rarely ever have a quorum when anyone is speaking. I want to make a short speech myself.

Mr. OVERMAN. I give notice that I shall call up the bill on Monday morning and will let everybody understand that I shall ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] or the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to move an adjournment until 11 o'clock on Monday, so that we can probably finish the bill on Monday.

Mr. KENYON. Will there be no session to-morrow afternoon?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I understand.

Mr. KENYON. I merely wish to know the arrangement, that is all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to join in the suggestion the Senator from North Carolina has made that we meet at 11 o'clock on Monday. I do not know that I ought to have any anxiety about the legislative program, but the calendar shows that we have practically only five weeks more.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator misunderstood what the Senator from North Carolina said. The motion has been agreed to that when the Senate adjourns it shall be to meet to-morrow at half past 10 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am merely speaking about Monday morning.

Mr. BRYAN. The suggestion is that when we adjourn to-morrow we adjourn until 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is understood.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a mere suggestion made by the Senator from North Carolina, I will say to the Senator from Florida, in which I join, that we meet at 11 o'clock on Monday and try to get along.

Mr. STONE. Under the resolution presented by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] this morning we are to adjourn until half past 10 to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. And then the Senate will take a recess to attend the funeral ceremonies in the Rotunda. I suppose after the ceremony is concluded that the Senate as a body will return here. The Senator from North Carolina in charge of the bill in talking with me about it suggested that when the Senate returns to its Chamber to-morrow an adjournment shall be taken until Monday at some hour; I mean that there shall be no business done to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There ought not to be a session to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. STONE. At least, the announcement was made that he would not call up this bill to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me say right here the President has issued a proclamation directing that all the departments of the Government be closed to-morrow, and I thought, in accordance with that proclamation, it would be wise not to do business to-morrow afternoon but to adjourn until Monday.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am about to move an executive session——

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator from Missouri when the Senate returns to its Chamber to-morrow at about 2 o'clock, after a little preliminary business, will move that the Senate adjourn until Monday at 11 o'clock.

Mr. STONE. Either the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] will make the motion or I shall make it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I mean to say that the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from Missouri, when the Senate returns to its Chamber after the exercises to-morrow, in accordance with the President's proclamation suspending public business, will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. KERN. I think the program as outlined will be satisfactory to everyone concerned.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate House bill 408, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over as the unfinished business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 47 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously made, until to-morrow, Saturday, January 20, 1917, at 10 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 19, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Hasten the day, O Lord God Almighty, when men of all conditions and circumstances of life shall strive to live to the highest condition of ethics as woven into the soul, iterated and reiterated in the Book of books, amplified by the great philosophers, seers, and religious teachers of all the ages; that by the rectitude of our behavior Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the committee to attend the funeral of Admiral Dewey.

The Clerk read the names, as follows:

Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, Mr. ESTOPINAL, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. HENSLEY, Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois, Mr. GRAY of Indiana, Mr. CALLAWAY, Mr. CONNELLY, Mr. HART, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. LIEBEL, Mr. VENABLE, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts, Mr. BROWNING, Mr. FARR, Mr. BRITTEN, Mr. KELLEY, Mr. MUDD, Mr. LOUD, Mr. DALE of Vermont, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, Mr. FOSS, and Mr. KETTNER.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill and joint resolutions of the following titles:

S. 5718. An act to provide for auxiliary reclamation project in connection with the Yuma project, Arizona;

S. J. Res. 186. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River; and

S. J. Res. 194. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur March 1, 1917, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of decorations conferred upon American Army and Navy officers by foreign governments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of decorations granted to the officers of the American Army and Navy by foreign kings, emperors, princes, and potentates. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SAMUEL UNTERMYER.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this morning Mr. Samuel Untermyer, of New York, called me by telephone from the Johns Hopkins Hospital at Baltimore, where he is at present, and requested me to present to the House a telegram which he had sent to me last night. Mr. Untermyer is ill, and is leaving to-day for Palm Beach for a two months' stay; and in view of the fact that his name was mentioned in a critical manner in the discussion of the employment of counsel for the so-called "leak" investigation, he is anxious to have a statement made which explains his position. I ask to have read the telegram he has sent me.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BALTIMORE, MD., January 18, 1917.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman House Committee on Appropriations,
Washington, D. C.:

This bandying around of my name on the floor of the House as though I had been seeking a job is no less, and perhaps more, of an outrage than the dastardly action of dragging in the names of public men in the mire on the authority of short-selling gamblers and Wall Street gutter rumor.

Congressmen have immunity from punishment, and have public responsibility; their words carry corresponding weight.

I did not want the place. Nobody ever suggested that I take it, and would not have accepted it except at great risk. Apart from all other considerations I have been and am still ill, and am leaving the hospital here to-morrow for Palm Beach for a two months' stay upon peremptory instructions of my physicians, pursuant to long-since-made arrangements.

I am anxious to see a thorough investigation for the sakes of those who may be proven to have been cruelly libeled. They are helpless against villification that cripples the public usefulness for which they make great sacrifices. That is the sort of thing that drives men out of public life in disgust.

I have just learned of the use that has been made of my name, and will feel indebted to you if in justice to me you will set the matter right for me before the House and the country in return for the effort to reform a public service, at great personal sacrifice, in championing the regulations of the stock exchange so that it will be a legitimate security market, which I believe to be one of our most urgent needs. I have been persistently misrepresented and maligned by their far-reaching press bureau for five years. They have been pursuing me, but I did not expect Members of Congress to swallow their inspired libels. I could have no purpose other than the public welfare, since I have in my life never bought stocks on margin or engaged in any form of speculative transactions. If I had, they would be bound to know of it. My Bethlehem stock has been owned by me for over 10 years.

SAMUEL UNTERMYER.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, as there may be further discussion of various phases of this matter, I hope that this statement of Mr. Untermyer will permit his name to pass into oblivion so far as this matter is concerned.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, may I make inquiry of the gentleman?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is that view which the gentleman has no doubt properly expressed based on the calumny that Mr. Untermyer saw fit to cast upon Members of Congress? Is it due to the comment in the message that the latter makes respecting Members of Congress and their conception of public duty?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not think that Members of Congress are absolutely innocent of gullability.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think so either, but I do not think that the language the gentleman has used in there is either parliamentary or decent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, Mr. Untermyer was criticized very severely from his standpoint without any apparent justification.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He was no stranger to Congress. We had observed his conduct of a very important investigation within the memory of many of us, probably all of us. If we saw fit to make some comment on it, I do not think that justifies him in sending an insult to Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think it is an insult.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman think that the language incorporated is an insult?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that if a private citizen without apparent reason is abused on the floor of the House because of his supposititious selection for some public service he has at least the right to make it clear that he did not seek the service, that it had not been suggested to him, and that in his present physical condition probably could not have accepted it if it had been offered.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think that may be true, but——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think when men go out of their way to throw bricks at private citizens who have rendered distinguished public service, those private citizens may be entitled to return the bricks.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. As to that statement, there is some doubt in the minds of some as to the value of the distinguished public service he has rendered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, men may doubt the value of the services which the gentleman from Minnesota and myself have rendered.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think the gentleman is correct, at least as to the latter part of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I were writing the message, I might not use the same language, but I probably would have been a little more vehement in expressing my indignation if I had been discussed on the floor as Mr. Untermyer was.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, as to that, the gentleman never will be. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, is this to be an attack on Mr. Untermyer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has reference to the letter which has just been read.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman intend to talk about Mr. Untermyer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is not a filibuster. I desire to comment upon the letter that has just been read, which was read to be placed in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. Unless we are going into a discussion of this matter, I do not think it is necessary——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Just a moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I was one of the Members of Congress who mentioned the name of Mr. Untermyer, and Mr. Untermyer's letter unquestionably reflects upon those Members of Congress who mentioned his name. I have no unkindly feeling toward Mr. Untermyer, but I think I ought to state why his name was mentioned, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is to be an attack upon Mr. Untermyer this morning, there may be some one here who will desire to defend him. He has some rights——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Untermyer's rights have been asserted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FOSTER. There may be some one who will want to defend Mr. Untermyer. I think myself he is a very clean citizen.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, there are a great many men in this country, men of prominence and some editorial writers, who take very great liberties with this House. They seem to assume that they can make a joke of Congress whenever they see fit. I believe in the dignity of the House, but I am aware that every man who is capable of writing a college essay and desires to do so is permitted to scatter broadcast reflections upon the honor and the dignity of the people's representatives, and that it creates a false impression of the Representatives here.

Samuel Untermyer, in this letter, has indicated that some Members of Congress have taken advantage of their privilege. Perhaps I was one to whom he referred. I have no interest in the world in Mr. Untermyer, and no desire to check him in any laudable and proper ambition; but I read in a newspaper a few days ago that Thomas Lawson, who has caused Congress a great deal of trouble and much humiliation, had suggested that he wanted the whole stock business of the country investigated, and wanted Mr. Samuel Untermyer engaged as the attorney to make that investigation. Now, I recollected that Mr. Untermyer was employed by Congress sometime ago as the people's representative to investigate the so-called Money Trust, and that he was engaged because he was supposed to have a heart that was bleeding for the downtrodden. I heard at that time that Mr. Untermyer was the representative of great corporations, and I questioned the wisdom of his selection as a representative of the people to investigate the corporations. When Mr. Lawson, the last man in the world to make the suggestion, proposed that Mr. Untermyer should be employed in this crisis to defend the honor of Congress, I questioned whether he was the proper man for the place, and made the suggestion that someone else should be selected. Now, Mr. Untermyer's record is in "Who's Who." If you want to know about great corporations go get that book and read what Mr. Untermyer has done in the way of erecting great corporations in this country, and then you will understand why I for one believe that he is the last person who should be considered, especially upon the recommendation of Mr. Lawson, to investigate any great combination or capitalistic interest, as the representative of the plain people of the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In view of the fact that the gentleman has gotten so excited——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not excited. I am emphatic——

Mr. FITZGERALD. In view of the fact that the gentleman has gotten so excited about the statements of Mr. Lawson, does he not think there is some justification for Mr. Untermyer's statement about Congressmen's capacity to swallow?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not catch what the gentleman said, and it makes very little difference. The gentleman has put in the RECORD a letter written by a man who assumed that Congress had said something about him. That letter refers to Bethlehem steel stock, which Mr. Untermyer says he holds and which is doubtless the cause of his grievance. There was absolutely nothing said upon this floor about Bethlehem steel stock when the Lawson matter was discussed. The gentleman is shooting off about Members of Congress without warrant, and I resent it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

ADVERTISEMENTS OF ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes, not on the subject which has just been discussed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] asks unanimous consent to proceed for not to exceed three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. In the time granted to me, Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read at the Clerk's desk a copy of a letter from the Olympia (Wash.) Building & Loan Association, addressed to one Mr. Henry S. Rosenthal.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

OLYMPIA BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION,
Olympia, Wash., January 12, 1917.

Mr. HENRY S. ROSENTHAL,
Care of American Building Association News,
15 West Sixth Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

DEAR MR. ROSENTHAL: I am very much surprised to receive a bunch of booze literature with your name attached to it and inclosing an appeal to us to protest against the enactment of a bill introduced by Mr. RANDALL, of California in the National Congress to prohibit advertisements of the liquor business, and in the same connection a bill by Mr. BANKHEAD to exclude liquor advertisements from the mails.

I shall not only not protest against the enactment of these bills, but since you have brought the matter to my attention I will write to our Representatives in Washington, D. C., and urge their cooperation in passing both of these bills. It is more than I can comprehend that anyone connected with the building and loan business would take an active participation in the propaganda of the booze crowd, especially a man in your high position in the building and loan movement and living as you do in Cincinnati where, if anywhere, a man can see the atrocity of the liquor business in all its forms.

The motto of the building and loan movement, as you know, is "The American home, the safeguard of American liberties." I have never yet heard of even a most pronounced liquor advocate indorsing the saloon as the friend of the American home. I don't see how you can be in both of these movements and be overburdened with consistency. It seems to me it is time for all building and loan men, above all others, to detach themselves from any complicity in the perpetuation of the liquor business. In this State we have outlawed the saloon and it is only a question of time when the importation into the State of any liquor except for strictly mechanical and medicinal purposes will be a felony.

As you undoubtedly have sent this stuff to all the building and loan associations of this State, I may take the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to all associations. I have in times past received other printed matter of the kind you now send me and I regret therefore to connect you with it. Please take our name from your booze mailing list at once. We are not interested in such propaganda.

Very truly, yours,

WALTER F. MCDOWELL,
Secretary.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its courtesy in yielding me the time to have this letter read.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE TRIBBLE.

Mr. RUCKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Sunday, February 4, 1917, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. SAMUEL J. TRIBBLE, late a Representative from the State of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the order will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Under the rule heretofore adopted, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18994) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of certain public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for certain public buildings; to abolish the Office of Supervising Architect of the Treasury and to create and organize in the Treasury Department a bureau of public buildings and define its duties, powers, and jurisdiction; to create and establish the office of commissioner of public buildings; to fix the salary and prescribe the duties and powers of the said commissioner of public buildings; to create a board of estimates and prescribe its duties and powers; to provide for the standardization of certain classes of public buildings, and for other purposes, with Mr. CLINE in the chair.

United States post office, at Havana, Ill., $40,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. This seems to be a post office the bill for which was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. I heard his very eloquent speech several days ago regarding economy, and the fact that the gentleman opposes any large appropriation at this session, I hope, will induce him to agree to my amendment and that it will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 12, by striking out line 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was considered, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Huntingdon, Tenn., $25,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 12, by striking out lines 9 and 10.

Mr. FREAR. I move to strike out the paragraph. Mr. Chairman, the only data that I shall submit on that item are that which has been furnished in regard to these and all other items which are subject to the same objection. Before I do that I wish to make one suggestion that we are entitled to make, and that is that there is no disposition to obstruct ordinary legislation or take up unnecessary time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say that we are perfectly satisfied to meet gentlemen on that basis; that there is no disposition on our side to shut off any legitimate discussion. If gentlemen will confine themselves to what is legitimate—and I want to say that the gentleman from Wisconsin has done that, although some others have not—if they will do that, there will be no objection.

Mr. FREAR. I will say that there are only a limited number of items which I intend to discuss and on which I base my objection. Yesterday we spent an hour in discussing a $300 item for a clerkship or work for the Military Committee, and yet we passed between five and seven million dollars appropriated for 50 or more public buildings with less than three hours' discussion. I submit it is only fair for us to have an understanding of what is contained in the bill. There are a few suggestions I wish to make concerning this particular item. This item refers to Huntingdon, Tenn. The population in 1910, according to statistics before me, was 1,112. The postal receipts for 1915 were $4,427. The estimated cost to the Government for carrying on or maintaining the building is $3,300 per annum.

There is a suggestion that comes to us from the public commission report in regard to these buildings which I want to read briefly, because it has a direct bearing on the item of cost of maintenance. I am reading from Mr. Allen's report, contained in the Public Building Commission report, page 53, in which it is said:

But the adoption of the policy of erecting buildings whenever post-office receipts reached $10,000 would further obligate the Government to the extent of the yearly increase in offices of this character, conservatively estimated at 542 from June 30, 1913, to January 1, 1920. There would then be 508 buildings and the increase of 542 to be erected, in all, 1,050. At $100,000 each these would cost $105,111,000 and their operation based on the average heretofore employed would be $2,612,158. This would be a total estimated operating charge per year of $9,542,988 for all such buildings. Three per cent interest on this investment would be $3,150,000.

The average rental for the 508 post offices is $822, and their total rental cost to the Government at this time $417,768.

There are 333 buildings from a total of 436 occupied for post offices only in commission November 1, 1913, erected for less than $100,000.

Only 72 of the 266 post offices and courthouses and customhouses in commission November 1, 1913, cost less than $100,000.

Four hundred and five of 702 buildings in commission November 1, 1913, were constructed for less than $100,000, and 297 were constructed at $100,000 or more.

There are 114 new buildings and 155 sites and buildings in the act of March 4, 1913, for which appropriations of $100,000 or less than that amount have been provided.

Forty-five of the projects not classed as special have appropriations of $100,000 or in excess of that amount.

It is estimated from figures of cost kept by the Supervising Architect's Office that the average cost of operation, including only janitor force, fuel, lights, water, and miscellaneous supplies for the kind of buildings now being constructed, the cost of which is approximately $50,000, is $1,815 per year; $75,000 is $2,320 per year; $100,000 is $3,789 per year. It will be noted that this estimate is based upon buildings as they are now constructed and differ from the average operating cost being paid for the 702 buildings in commission on November 1, 1913.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not ask any gentleman to vote for this bill on my account. I have been serving in this House 20 years on the 4th of next March. There has never been but one public building built in my district within that time and that cost $40,000.

Now, the town of Huntingdon is in Carroll County, Tenn. Carroll County is one of the most reliable Republican counties in my State, and even this city of Huntingdon is a Republican city. Seven nominees of the opposition parties that have run against me in the 20 years that I have been in Congress were from Carroll County; both the first and last one were from Carroll County. I succeeded the Hon. John E. McCall, who was a Republican Member of the Fifty-fourth Congress. He was a citizen and native of this town. He is now an honored and distinguished district judge of the United States court for the western district of Tennessee.

But there is a matter of sentiment in this matter. But before coming to that I will state about the receipts. The receipts for the last quarter of last year as reported by the chairman of the committee were $1,580. If that rate of increase continues the receipts will soon amount to $10,000.

A site had been acquired and it took two bills to do it. The first amount appropriated was $2,500, but for that price we could not get a corner site. And then there was an additional bill authorizing it to be built in the middle of the square and not on a corner of the public square.

This town was the home town of my beloved and deceased friend, James C. Courts, clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, who came into the public service of this House 39 years ago. I did not introduce the bill on my own suggestion, because there are other towns in my district—there are Democratic towns—where buildings are needed. Mr. Courts's brother-in-law, who was then and now is mayor of the city, a stanch Republican, asked and begged me to do this, and I did it; and I will stand by it to the last. Mr. Courts has saved to this Government, by way of an economic and efficient service, a sum far greater than any individual Member in this House or at the other end of this Capitol has ever saved it. This is a memorial to a man who advised the great Committee on Appropriations as its clerk and who assisted that great committee in its conferences with the Senate. I appeal to you to waive your arbitrary, technical requirements as to the question of receipts and construct this building. I made what was in the nature of a personal sacrifice in this matter, because I was appealed to by others where the towns had more receipts and that were Democratic cities; but I wanted the flag to fly over the town in which James C. Courts lived and remained a citizen until his death. I do not care whether it is economical or not, whether it will cost more or less than the present receipts of the office. There is not a public building in the United States to-day that could not be run under private management for less than the maintenance and operation of it by the Government, even this Capitol Building. I feel it is nothing but justice to myself that I should say this much in explaining this paragraph in the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Lancaster, Pa., $250,000.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, line 18, insert, after the words "post office," the following: "headquarters for the internal-revenue district and for other Government offices."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a telegram from the postmaster of Lancaster, Pa., stating that the postal receipts in that office for the fiscal year ending June 30 last were $200,116, and that for the calendar year ending December 31, 1916, the receipts were $203,600.

I also am in receipt of a telegram from the collector of internal revenue, whose headquarters are in the Lancaster building, to the effect that the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30 last were $3,605,103.35.

I do not believe that there is any other rural community in the United States that can show revenue and postal receipts exceeding in aggregate the amounts which I have mentioned.

The present building in which these governmental activities are housed was provided for by the Congress about the year 1886, at which time the postal receipts were only $32,974.69 and revenue receipts were $1,448,629.94 annually, and unfortunately the building was constructed for the business of the moment and not with a view to the marvelous development of the future. To-day six times as much postal business is transacted in this building as was contemplated when it was constructed, the receipts of the internal-revenue business have almost trebled, and many other governmental activities now seek quarters in this building. In proportion almost to the increase in business has the building become inadequate and insufficient in floor space and in arrangement. Being convinced of that fact and being advised by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury that an enlargement of the present building was not practicable, the Congress in 1913 authorized the purchase of a site for a new building, and now in the pending measure an appropriation of $250,000 is asked that the erection of the building may be proceeded with.

Not alone from the viewpoint of exceptionally large revenue and postal receipts should a Federal building adequate for all governmental purposes be erected in Lancaster. There are also historical and other reasons why a building of memorial design and monumental proportions should be provided. In this colonial town, then the largest inland town in all the Colonies, the Continental Congress held a sitting, making Lancaster for the time the Capital of the Colonies. For many years, also, Lancaster was the capital of the Keystone State. The mortal remains of a signer of the Declaration of Independence are buried here, as are those of the adjutant general of the Revolutionary forces. Here lived and died a President of the United States, who, as one of my predecessors, sat in this House during a period of 10 years, and subsequently, prior to his election to the Presidency, represented this country as ambassador to England and as Secretary of State. The great commoner, Thaddeus Stevens, who devoted his life to the destruction of the slave traffic and the preservation of the Union, and who was the acknowledged leader and master of the House during the stormy days of the Civil War, lies buried in an honored grave in Lancaster, where most of his life was lived. There, too, were spent the boyhood days of Robert Fulton, the inventor of the steamboat, to whom, if to any inventive genius, the Government of the United States owes a memorial, as does the whole wide world.

It is apparent, therefore, that while there are business reasons in an extraordinary degree for the passage of this appropriation, there is history and sentiment that can well be commemorated, without additional cost to the Government, in the design and character of the structure contemplated.

I shall not burden the RECORD nor consume the time of the House with the statistics, official documents, and other matters that convinced the committee of the meritorious character of this proposition. This evidence is in the files of the Public Buildings Committee and is accessible if needed. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at Lenoir, N. C., $30,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 12, by striking out lines 22 and 23.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I do not know the names of the Representatives who are responsible for these various items, and I regret if I step on anyone's toes. I did not know that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], with whom I was discussing this bill yesterday, was responsible for the item he has just been talking about. I did not know that it was his personal item. But these are not personal items. They are items that concern the Government of the United States and the Treasury at this particular time, and all of these items, according to the Treasury Department report, under which we are proceeding now, with rare exceptions, are open to the same objection of inexcusable waste.

This is an item for a United States post office and other Government offices at Lenoir, N. C., and the amount authorized is $30,000. There are 11 Federal courthouses to-day in the State of North Carolina. There are as many Federal courthouses in that one State of North Carolina as in the State of Illinois and the State of Ohio combined. This item provides for other Government offices at Lenoir. I do not know whether it is for a courthouse or not, but I want to suggest something which comes from this report of the public-buildings commission which seems to have a direct bearing on this item and others of similar character.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman admits that the receipts of this office are beyond $10,000?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes; according to the report. But that has nothing to do with it, as I view it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to state to the gentleman that this is not an effort to provide a courthouse, but it is an internal-revenue and civil-service office.

Mr. FREAR. The population of this town is 3,364, and the post-office receipts annually amounted to $9,827, while the rent paid is $840 a year. It is proposed to take over, according to the Treasury estimates, a maintenance charge of $5,000 a year, which is over 500 per cent greater than the Government pays at present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman get me a little extra time?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to ask the gentleman what he thinks the postal receipts ought to be in order to have a Government building, and also what he thinks the population of the town ought to be?

Mr. FREAR. I am very glad to answer the gentleman.

Let me say, first, that those who have given study to this subject, and I do not pretend to be an expert, and do not want to be placed in that rôle—taking, for instance, Mr. Burleson. He says that the rent of every proposed city post office should be $1,000 a year, and there should be 5,000 inhabitants before a building is constructed. That is the same statement that the gentleman who sits in the chair, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE], put into his committee report. I do not pretend to have better judgment than such gentlemen. Speaking for myself, I say that where we are paying $800 a year rent, and are asked by this bill to undertake a charge of $5,000 a year for maintenance, there can be no justification for the Government undertaking the additional expense. That will be five or six or seven hundred per cent more than we are paying now. Before authorizing a new building I think comparative costs ought to be approximately the same. That is the business way of locating such buildings.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let the gentleman give me his figures on population and postal receipts.

Mr. FREAR. I am giving the reports. I do not pretend to be an expert.

Mr. AUSTIN. But I have asked the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. FREAR. I can not give any opinion without a specific case is presented. These gentlemen in the Treasury Department and in the Post Office Department have given opinions. As a lawyer, I would not assume to give you the law, according to my own convictions, but I would give you the law as set down by precedents and by whose judgment would be accepted. I state what the Treasury Department says the comparative cost is going to be. That statement speaks for itself.

Mr. AUSTIN. But the gentleman is criticizing the members of our committee for bringing this report in. Now, what is his judgment?

Mr. FREAR. I am giving the gentleman the best opinion I can possibly obtain. It is immaterial what my judgment may be. I have said positively and frequently that, in my judgment, the increase should not be excessive, as a good business proposition, probably none at all. The maintenance charge should be approximately the same as is paid for annual rental, but this item is five or six or seven hundred per cent more than what we are now paying.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman has challenged and criticized our judgment. Now, I would like to have his.

Mr. FREAR. I have given it three times.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman has given me the judgment and opinion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. FREAR. I have given the gentleman my judgment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let us have it on postal receipts and population.

Mr. FREAR. I do not care what the postal receipts may be. They have no relation whatever to the location of a new building, in my judgment. It should be a question of comparative cost under present conditions, and what is proposed to be the additional cost of maintenance. I can not make this plainer than that. Others have given different standards. All of them are more stringent than the present lack of standards.

Now I ask the privilege of reading this paragraph; I do not think it will take over two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for two minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. On page 21 of the report of this commission, which made an extended and full investigation of the subject, it says:

Whenever public buildings are authorized quarters should be provided, if possible, for all permanent Government offices; but no provision should be made for any branch of the service that will not have real need of accommodations for at least one day each month, except in the case of United States courts. United States court accommodations should be provided only at places where courts have actually been in session for at least 10 days the preceding year.

It would seem to me if they were in session 20 days it would be sufficient, but it ought to be 30 days or more. The report continues:

This will prevent the designation for holding United States court for the purpose of securing original authorizations for buildings or additional appropriations to provide more imposing structures than have already been authorized. It is necessary in such cases to provide rooms for the court, judges, grand and petit juries, etc. The useless expenditure of public money for court accommodations should cease.

It states there should be some definite number of days of court or use assured as to that building before a building be authorized at that place. I submit there is nothing to indicate it in this case, or in any other case presented by this bill. Nothing is submitted, but under this proposal any expenditures may be demanded without need for other activities being shown.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

United States post office at Lyons, N. Y., $40,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. This is another item which the Treasury Department states will not appear to be of any profit to the Government. I want to call attention to the fact that in 1890 this town had a population of 4,475, 4,300 in 1900, and 4,460 in 1915, losing 15 in 20 years.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Marengo, Iowa, $30,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be another town where the population is less in 1910 than in 1900, having a population of 2,070 in 1900 and 1,786 in 1910. I would like to read from the hearings which took place on March 23, 1916, at which were present Mr. CLARK of Florida, chairman; Mr. BURNETT; and Mr. AUSTIN:

Mr. BURNETT. They have very small postal receipts and it is a very small town; $7,500 postal receipts and only 1,786 population.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. JAMES. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the postal receipts of this town increased over $3,000 in one year—in 1915. It is something over $7,000 in 1916. They have way over $10,000.

Mr. JAMES. I am talking about the time the gentleman from Iowa appeared before the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All right.

Mr. JAMES. And it is upon that information that the item for the public building was reported out in this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will permit me, I stated yesterday distinctly that we not only had that information, but we looked into the prospects of the town where it appeared to be undoubtedly true that before this bill could be considered it would reach the limit, and allowed the item. I stated that several times.

Mr. JAMES. What did the gentleman do with the towns of Carlinville, Ill.; with Decatur, Ind.; Green River, Wyo.; with Greensburg, Ind.; with Linton, Ind.; with Newark, Del.; with Niles, Ohio.; with Rogersville, Tenn., where the postal receipts were less in the quarter ending September 30, 1916, than nine months before January 1, 1916?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We will answer that when we get to them.

Mr. JAMES. I notice further along Mr. BURNETT repeats:

I notice that their postal receipts have increased only $2,000 in 11 years. In 1905 they were over $5,000, and this last year they were only $7,000. That does not seem to be a very great increase.

And I want to say when $7,500 postal receipts with a population of 1,786 seems small in Iowa it is considered very large for some other State in the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office, courthouse, and land office at Montrose, Colo., $150,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read is follows:

Page 13, line 14, after the last word "office," insert "and other Government offices."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I understand the committee accepts that. There is a large Government reclamation project there with some 25 or 30 clerks employed.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I suggest the word "and" before the word "land" should be stricken out.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I move that the word "and," in line 14 be stricken out so as to make it grammatically correct.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There is no objection to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at Morgan City, La., $40,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. Morgan City, La., seems to have postal receipts, October 1 last, of $8,370.63. It costs $3,800 to maintain this building. This is another building which the Treasury Department states will not be profitable to the Government. The rent now paid is only $960. Interest alone will be $1,200 per annum on the proposed new building.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. JAMES. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. I understand that my colleague's objection to various items in this bill is to those where the receipts are less than $10,000. Is that correct?

Mr. JAMES. That is partly the reason; yes; partly the fact that we are facing a deficit of over $300,000,000, and also the fact that I am not in favor of erecting public buildings or buying sites in dead, dying, or decadent towns.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask my colleague whether or not he has made a list of all of such cities included in the bill and, if so, what the aggregate appropriations for these places would be?

Mr. JAMES. I will take each item as we come to it. While I have not made such a list, the Treasury Department has.

Mr. KELLEY. I am asking you if you have made a list and if you have made an aggregate? I would like to know the sum total.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman would like to know the list of the different projects that the Treasury Department does not recommend, and which they state could not be built with profit to the Government. I shall be pleased to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. KELLEY. You have not the information?

Mr. JAMES. I have a list of what they consider undesirable items, and of which they do not approve. The officials of the Treasury Department are in position to know whether or not these items are desirable.

Mr. KELLEY. I want to know what the aggregate expense provided in this bill for such projects as you are objecting to amounts to?

Mr. JAMES. I shall be pleased to put in the RECORD the different items criticized by the Treasury Department, and the gentleman can figure up the total amount.

Mr. KELLEY. My colleague has not added these items together?

Mr. JAMES. I shall be pleased to put these items in the RECORD. In the meantime, I expect to call attention of the House to each undesirable item as we reach it, and will show why a public building should not be built in the town mentioned, or why a site should not be purchased.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, to show the indiscriminate objection to these items I want to call attention to this one. Here is a town shown by the census of 1910 to have a population of 5,477 people. The amount being paid for rent is $960 a year. There is to be taken care of the post office, the civil service, and the customs service. There is a customs office at Morgan City. The population is vastly more now, and the receipts are $8,700, in addition to the customs, with a population of more than 5,000. And yet gentlemen object. As to these maintenance charges, I think I covered that in my original argument, in which I showed the employment of janitors was folly; that these supplies were folly.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No. It is simply ridiculous. There are no such maintenance charges as the gentlemen are talking about here.

I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Mount Olive, N. C., $30,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The chairman of the committee states that the maintenance charges are folly. I wish to show from quoting Rochester, Minn., that $900 and more is paid on buildings of this kind. The light at Rochester, Minn., was $231.57; heat, $435.50; water, $132.11; miscellaneous supplies, $74.69; removing ashes and rubbish, $32.96, which shows that $900 is being paid in small buildings of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at Nephi, Utah, $25,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to this item because it presents still another. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The population in 1910 was 2,759. The receipts last year were $4,936, according to the statement which has been furnished us. The rent was $95 last year. The proposed annual cost of maintenance, as estimated by the Treasury Department, is $3,800. It is an unprofitable investment. It is extravagance. What I desired to offer, however, was something that I could not find before when the chairman of the Buildings Committee spoke of a place for civil-service examinations.

Now, from this building commission's report, which was submitted by the commission of which the chairman was an honorable member at that time, I read in regard to civil-service examinations wherein the report says that they recommend such rooms be not included in the plans for public buildings. It recommends that these examinations can be held in other rooms of the buildings by the commission at less expense to the Government.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, in regard to all these various activities outside of the Post Office Department, this report gives specific advice as to what should be considered in these cases, and there is no evidence before the committee as to how many times during the year there will be civil-service examinations. The committee does not know, in fact. It can not show, very naturally it can not determine, from the situation. I submit with only $95 annual rent, at a cost for maintenance of over $3,000, it is not a very good investment for the Government.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], and I want to congratulate him upon his conversion.

I find on examination of the records of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that in the last Congress he introduced two bills, one of them providing for an appropriation of $75,000 at Hudson, Wis., where the population was 2,810, where the postal receipts were $10,528.34, and where the rental was $720. He also introduced a bill providing for a $75,000 building at Rice Lake, Wis., where the population was placed at 3,963 and the postal receipts at $11,769.44, and where the rental was $800. According to the figures made by the Treasury Department, covering interest, depreciation, janitor service, and supplies, the fixed charges would be $6,247 per annum for each of these buildings. Now, the gentleman, in his speech of December 7, on page 107, criticizing the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for bringing in the last public-buildings bill, refers to a number of towns as villages. Now, his village has a population of 2,810, and the ones he criticizes and denominates as villages, many of them, have a population in excess of the population of the towns mentioned in his bills.

So, Mr. Chairman, I want simply to congratulate the gentleman upon a change of front on this public question. His new idea is that such items represent a horrible waste and extravagance which he now points out and denounces. Virtually he committed himself to the system when he prepared the two bills and sent them to our committee, and he evidently did it in good faith and expected them to pass. That is why he introduced the bills, unless he is willing to publicly confess that he did it as pure buncombe, to get votes, and did not mean it.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Do you think that every time that a man introduces a bill for a public building he believes that bill is all right?

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, I would expect it in a reformer like yourself and your working colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]; that you would practice precisely what you preach; that you would not ask the committee to consider an important bill unless you evidently prepared it in good faith and were acting in good faith.

Mr. JAMES. Have you found any bills introduced by me?

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, I have not said anything about the gentleman. I am simply congratulating his running mate in this debate on his conversion. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. The question is on agreeing to the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at Newcastle, Wyo., $25,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves to strike out the paragraph. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 14, by striking out lines 8 and 9.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, unless it has materially increased, the population of Newcastle, Wyo., is less now than it was 20 years ago. It had 1,715 in 1890 and only 975 in 1900, and the Government is now paying no rent at Newcastle, Wyo.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at New Martinsville, W. Va., $40,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the paragraph. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Amend, page 14, by striking out lines 10 and 11.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the population of this town was 21,076 in 1910, according to the statement. The receipts are $10,538; the annual rent is $622. The proposal, according to the department, will cost the Government $4,800 a year for maintenance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in all fairness to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], who addressed us a moment ago, let me say that I did introduce two bills when I first came here in the Sixty-third Congress, nearly three years ago. I had never heard about Treasury estimates at that time. I had never seen this Public Building Commission's report, which the gentleman from Tennessee signed, and which showed the governmental waste on all these propositions. I had not the faintest conception of what the public-building situation was at that time. That was at the beginning of the Sixty-third Congress, first session. But at this session, after three years and full information given by the Building Commission, here is an item introduced by the gentleman himself during this Sixty-fourth Congress. He asks for a public building at Jefferson City, a town of 1,328 population. In 1915 the receipts reached only $4,771, for stamp sales. He asks for a building in that village to cost $160,000. [Laughter.] And here are a number of items, all the way through the statement, of bills the gentleman from Tennessee has introduced at this session and long after having signed that report. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, the bill mentioned by the gentleman did not call for $160,000.

Mr. FREAR. That is the statement which I hold.

Mr. AUSTIN. That was an error made either by the Government Printing Office or by the clerk to the committee.

I am not an economist, and never have been. [Laughter.] I want to tell the gentleman I never vote against an appropriation and never vote for a tax. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Oelwein, Iowa, $40,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida: On page 14, line 18, strike out the figures "$40,000" and in lieu thereof insert the figures "$50,000."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] called my attention to the fact that the committee had inadvertently put a less amount in this place than it ought to have in accordance with other towns of like size. Therefore I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office, Department of Justice, and other Government offices at Pikeville, Ky., $35,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the paragraph. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the population of Pikeville, Ky., as shown by this statement, was 1,280 in 1910. The revenues annually, according to the statement of the Treasury Department, were $6,149 for the sale of postage stamps in 1915, not for building public buildings. The rent last year was $332. Under the new arrangement the estimate of cost to the Government will be $3,500 a year, or more than ten times the present cost.

Now, the suggestion is made that this is for the Department of Justice. But let it be said, Mr. Chairman, there are already 12 Federal courthouses in Kentucky to-day, more than in the States of Illinois and Ohio put together. Yet down in Pikeville we are to have more Departments of Justice organized, notwithstanding the annual rent paid to-day is only $332.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to say that if the gentleman had paid attention to what I said yesterday about Pikeville, he would know that his statement is based upon conditions that existed seven years ago with reference to the population and other matters, and that the town has increased since then. The receipts thus far this year show that they will be over $8,000 for the entire year, and they will soon be over $10,000 for that matter.

Mr. FREAR. I do not want the gentleman to take all my time. The revenues last year were $6,149. Of course the gentleman, as he said yesterday, introduced 11 bills, of which 8 were for purposes other than post offices. These other activities avoid the law which the committee assumes to consider. Every town will now want them.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman will learn in time how these matters work out.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the gentleman think that some States need more courts and more sheriffs than other States? [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. I am not an expert on that subject, either; but the gentleman from Kentucky must answer for himself.

Mr. LANGLEY. That may be true of Tennessee and Wisconsin, for ought I know. Of course I understand, Mr. Chairman, and so do the people of my district understand, that it would not be possible for me, or any other Member, to get at one time a public building provided for every place that I have introduced bills for, or even for every place in the district that needs such a building right now. They are just as intelligent as we are and they know how the public business at Washington is conducted or ought to be conducted. They know that it takes time to work out all of these matters and they know, too, whether their Member is doing his duty or not. It is true that I introduced a bill providing for a public building at each county seat in the district, and I believe that this ought to be done and will be done as soon as the public business at these points require it and the condition of the Treasury will admit of it. I believe it ought to be done not only as a good business proposition but because it would make the people feel in these localities that this great Government really recognizes them as an important and essential part of it by putting one of its buildings in their midst with the flag of the Nation flying over it. I am conscientious, gentlemen, in the belief that it would tend to instill a higher sense of patriotism in the hearts of the people, although, as I have already indicated, this is not nearly so much needed in the mountains of Kentucky as it is in certain other sections of the country. Mr. Chairman, it is only in recent years that the Federal Government has taken any steps toward the erection of public buildings in our section of Kentucky and I hope that I shall not be accused of immodesty if I say that I think I am entitled to some credit for what it has done in this direction and that I expect to be entitled to still more. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is a single individual in the entire Tenth Kentucky District who believes, as has been intimated here and elsewhere, that I was seeking to mislead anyone in the different localities covered by these bills by making them believe that I expected to get all of these public buildings right away. They know my views and attitude on this question and that I will get these appropriations as rapidly as it is possible to do, giving preference, as the rules of the committee require, to the localities where the most urgent need exists for such building and where the volume of the Government business is the greatest. By this course the different towns and cities in the district have been better advised of the real situation and of the relative progress which each is making. Still another thing I had in view was to bring more forcefully to the attention of the entire country the real greatness of our section and the inexcusable manner in which the Federal Government has neglected and ignored it. I think it will be conceded, in view of this debate, that I have not failed in that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Rogersville, Tenn., $25,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 15, by striking out lines 5 and 6.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Rossville, Ga., $25,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 15, by striking out line 7.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, the postal receipts at Rossville, Ga., on October 1 last were $8,333.61. The Government is now paying $398 a year rent. It is estimated that the maintenance of the new building would cost $4,200 a year. The population in 1910 was only 1,059 persons.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is to strike out the paragraph.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at Sandersville, Ga., $30,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Amend, on page 15, by striking out lines 10 and 11.

Mr. JAMES. In October last the postal receipts at Sandersville, Ga., were $8,618.05. The Government is now paying a rent of $600. The maintenance of the new building would be $4,800.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at San Bernardino, Cal., $70,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 15, line 13, strike out the figures "$70,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$85,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at St. Johns, Oreg., $25,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 21 and 22, on page 15, for the United States post office at St. Johns, Oreg., $25,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 15, by striking out lines 21 and 22.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion at the request of the gentleman from that district [Mr. MCARTHUR], who requests it in view of the statement of the postmaster. He states that at the time the authorization was made for the purchase of a site for a Federal building at St. Johns, Oreg., St. Johns was a separate city with a separate post office. It is now a branch of the Portland office, and therefore the building is unnecessary.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, the city of St. Johns was made a part of the city of Portland, Oreg., by a vote of the people of the two cities in 1914. I understand that it is not the policy of the department or of Congress to appropriate money for buildings for branch post offices or substations. The separate office that was formerly maintained at St. Johns is now a substation of the Portland post office. There is on file with the committee a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury saying that there is no need for this appropriation for a building at St. Johns, because it is a substation of the Portland office. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate this letter as a part of my remarks. This letter quotes from a letter written to the Secretary of the Treasury by Hon. Frank S. Myers, postmaster of the city of Portland, Oreg.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 12, 1917.

THE CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
United States House of Representatives.

SIR: In response to your request of the 3d instant the following report is submitted on bill H. R. 16853, providing for the erection of a public building at St. Johns, Oreg.:

The post office requires 1,820 square feet floor space, and pays an annual rental of $600.

The postal receipts for the fiscal year 1905 were $2,437.02; and the receipts for the fiscal year 1915 are included in those for Portland, Oreg., of which city St. Johns is a station.

Purchase of a site was authorized by act of March 4, 1913, within a limit of cost of $5,000.

It is estimated that a one-story building, with a ground area of 2,300 square feet, will be required, and that the cost of the same will be $30,000.

In submitting information as to receipts, amount of space required, etc., the Post Office Department included a communication from the postmaster, Portland, Oreg., in which the following statements occur:

"* * * The appropriation of $5,000 to purchase a site for the proposed St. Johns Federal building was made at a time when St. Johns was a separate post office of a separate city. For several years St. Johns was a branch of this office. It is now a station of this office, and the former city of St. Johns is now within the corporate limits of the city of Portland.

"So far as I know, there is no demand from any source for a Federal building at St. Johns; in fact, there is about as much need for a Federal building at St. Johns station of this office as there is for another Washington Monument in Washington, D. C. My opinion is that the people of this city would look upon the construction of a Federal building at St. Johns as a waste of public money."

Respectfully,

W. G. McADOO, Secretary.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, the St. Johns substation receipts for the last fiscal year amounted to $6,058, and as the community is growing in size and importance it would soon be entitled to a Federal building had it not been merged with the city of Portland. I introduced the St. Johns building bill in good faith, for I was not then aware of the well-established policy of not appropriating money for substations. In view of this policy and the statements made by the postmaster at Portland it would be futile for me to oppose the motion to strike the item from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment to strike out lines 21 and 22, on page 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Union Springs, Ala., $25,000.

Mr. JAMES. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 16, strike out lines 8 and 9.

Mr. JAMES. On October 1, 1916, the postal receipts of Union Springs, Ala., were $7,005.01. On January 1, at the time the bill was introduced, the postal receipts were $7,027. The Government is now paying no rent at all at Union Springs, Ala., and this is one of the items condemned by the Treasury Department, which estimates that it will cost the Government $4,800 a year to maintain the proposed structure.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Unionville, Mo., $30,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this motion is contained in a statement which I have read from before and which covers 200 items, most of which are stated to be wasteful as to cost. Unionville, Mo., is given here as a town of 2,000 population in 1910. The postal receipts last year, 1915, were $6,956.44. The rental is $450 a year. The amount of cost for maintenance will be $4,000, as estimated by the department, or an increase for maintenance of 800 per cent. I desire to read from the report of the public-building commission some suggestions which have come through the Treasury Department. Many think that the department sits up there by itself and urges its own ideas, but here are statements made by Congressmen to the Secretary of the Treasury which have been put into the report. Mr. McAdoo's letter follows, and here are the statements on page 74. It says:

Many suggestions were received in reply to this invitation. Congress is apparently keenly alive to the necessity for a change in the public-buildings system. Below are given a few of the suggestions which are selected to give a general view of the expressions of opinion.

"It is wrong to complete buildings in small towns—'tank towns'—to the exclusion of needed and necessary improvements in larger cities."

"Something is radically wrong in the system of the Supervising Architect's Office. Plans and specifications should be duplicated."

"Standardize the need for buildings."

"Post offices and buildings in small towns are too expensive."

"Private concerns would build at half the expense."

"Suspend building until the present changing needs of the Post Office Department are settled."

"Use standard-type plans for buildings under $500,000."

"Build only when the commercial necessities demand it. Omit court rooms in small towns where court is rarely held. Use simple architecture and standardize appropriations."

"Erect buildings only on the recommendation of the head of the department. Get away from the 'pork barrel.'"

"Conditions governing appropriations are bad. Appropriations should not be made for cities of less than 15,000 people."

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman think that the adoption of the suggestions which he is reading from would relieve this bill of the accusation of being a pork-barrel bill?

Mr. FREAR. I am not prepared to say. I would accept in preference to that the proposition of the distinguished Speaker of this House, who made a proposition which I believe is fair and preferable. He proposes that after the receipts have reached a certain amount, whatever may be the sum agreed upon, that thereafter automatically it is taken away from Congress to determine; no matter what section of the country was interested, the building would automatically be constructed under the law. But we are 2,000 buildings behind, according to any reasonable estimate, if all cities are to be provided under the terms of this bill, yet we are building only 100 post offices a year, and we will never catch up. We must face this situation; the sooner the better.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to ask the gentleman why he is being controlled by the recommendations of the Treasury Department, when he absolutely fights the tests and recommendations of the War Department and the engineers in the river and harbor improvement?

Mr. FREAR. I am not reading from the Treasury Department report; I am reading from the recommendations of Congressmen contained in letters to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. AUSTIN. But the gentleman has been quoting the Treasury Department all through this bill from the time the consideration began. Why does not the gentleman quote the War Department and the engineers in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. FREAR. Because they are absolutely unreliable, and I will show you when you get into the bill that their recommendations are unreliable and extravagant, because they do not understand business methods nor the needs of navigation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Can not the Treasury Department be wrong?

Mr. FREAR. Possibly so; but this is a question of dollars and cents easy of ascertainment, and can be determined if not correct in any particular. It is a mere matter of ascertainment based on experience and investments required.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

United States post office at Urbana, Ohio, $50,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to make a statement. This is the item in the bill that was introduced by myself. I will vote to strike it out if the House will vote to amend the bill to strike out the items that fall below the $10,000 receipts recommended by the department. The question has been raised as to the ethics of a Member voting against a bill who has an item in the bill. The post-office site at Urbana, Ohio, was purchased at a cost of $13,000 by the Government some time soon after a bill was presented in 1910. I introduced a bill to erect a building with a limit of cost at $50,000. The bill is reported in an omnibus bill with over 200 items in it that do not fall within the recommendations of the department, but this item has more than three times the amount in the way of receipts that is recommended in the last paragraph of the present bill.

I am not here to be the monitor of the ethics of Members of this House, and I am not here to be the arbiter of the judgment of the Members of this House. I certainly am not the keeper of any man's conscience in this House except my own. Therefore, I am not going to impugn the motives of men in their attitude on this bill. That is not my business and I am not going to do more than to criticize the methods of this legislation. I know that it is the judgment of this House that this method of legislating must stop. It will not continue. It must appear to every Member present that the country will not stand for it much longer. While I have no sympathy with the method that is taken in what might be regarded a filibuster against any measure, for I know that this bill in all probability will be passed by the House unless a change of attitude takes place, and while I am perfectly satisfied that it will not be considered at all in the Senate, and therefore I need not have much solicitation about the final vote on the bill, yet the judgment of the people is against this method of legislation. I will make a motion to strike out this item for Urbana if it will carry a defeat of this bill in the House. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to understand the gentleman. Does he make a motion to strike out the item, or does he attach some condition to it?

Mr. FESS. I made a motion to strike out the last word in order to make this statement.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Merely a pro forma amendment. The gentleman intends to withdraw that pro forma amendment.

Mr. FESS. In order that I may state to the House whether I think it ethical to vote against the bill when it includes an item meeting all the requirements of the department for a building.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand. The gentleman is willing that his item should be defeated if all the rest are defeated?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I would make a motion to strike out the item, but I am not willing it should be stricken out unless the others are. [Laughter and applause.] That may appear to have been a statement compromising my position, but I hope that I am not misunderstood.

Mr. Chairman, this is the thing that embarrasses me. There are Members on this floor, lovable in character, whose judgment I greatly appreciate, who believe that we ought to have "our share." My good friend, whom I love, a most amiable character, and one of the keenest debaters I have heard within this Chamber, my friend Mr. BURNETT, used the expression "our share" several times on yesterday; many others employed the same phraseology. I can not understand that angle in legislation about "our share." This is Uncle Sam's business, and if Uncle Sam finds it profitable and desirable to put a building in one place, well and good, but to say that it is patriotic to get "our share" is to invoke an angle of legislation that I do not understand, and I impugn the motives of no man when I say this, and that is the enormity of it—they believe it and sincerely believe it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is willing to take his "share" and hold his "share" in the bill unless the other "shares" go out of it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It is not a share; it is a building by Uncle Sam, and the profits in Urbana will be much more than the expenses, and therefore will be a profitable movement—not merely a convenience for the people of Urbana, but a proper business step for the Government of the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. And yet the gentleman is willing to strike it out, meritorious as it is, if they will strike out the other fellow's "share." That is the idea.

Mr. FESS. I would like to make one other statement. I may be misunderstood. I shall move to strike out Urbana if [Cries of "Go ahead!"]—I shall move to strike out Urbana if we strike out, not all the items, but if we strike out all the more than 200 items the receipts of which are less than $10,000, and Urbana's receipts are nearly $30,000. That is the proposition I will put to you. It is a high price to pay, but not too high for the remedy of such legislation as herein proposed.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I agree with what my colleague [Mr. FESS] has said in many respects, and I regret that we have to have an omnibus bill in order to get a public-buildings bill through this House. It seems that is the only way to do it. I want to say to him that if he will make a motion to strike out all of these places the receipts of which are under $10,000 I shall vote with him. I am going to vote for this measure because it contains a provision for a post office in my district. [Laughter.] There is no post office in my district, and Painesville, Ohio, needs such a building. If I have to vote for a bill that is called a pork bill, if that is the manner of doing business in Congress, I shall have to submit to it. If I must vote for places that do not deserve a building in order to get one for a place that deserves it, then I will have to do it. I regret to have to do it, but I shall have to do it if it is necessary to proceed in that way in order to get a public building in my district. [Laughter and applause.]

I think a great many things that the gentleman from Ohio said are correct, but I shall stand by the bill. It seems that some law should be enacted whereby, as the distinguished Speaker of this House has stated, when a place reaches a certain point as regards population and receipts it should automatically have a public building. I have voted to strike out of this bill every item where the figures did not justify it. The method of enacting this legislation is wrong, just as my colleague [Mr. FESS] has stated, and I hope in the future this may be remedied.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at West Point, Va., $25,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 16, in line 17, by inserting, after the word "office," the words "and customhouse."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, the question that is raised in my mind by the repeated statement of the word "pork" here is, What is pork in a public appropriation bill? Is it pork to come here to the city of Washington, the Capital of the Nation, and tax the rural communities, the small towns, the people who live away from the Capital, and who will never see it, in order that we may make this the most beautiful city in the world? Is it pork to go into the seaports and erect there beautiful customhouses, constructed of marble, in order to add to the beauty of the particular city, and to add to the environments of the community in which it is constructed? Is it pork to go into the various places where the Government does things not merely for utilitarian purposes but for the purpose of beautifying the community and encouraging the people in that community to have some higher ideals than merely groveling for money? Is it pork when we take money to construct great vessels for the Navy, vessels which are not merely engines of destruction, but in which we put things that appeal to the taste of the men who are on them, in order to give them music on board ship, to give them libraries and handsome rooms, to put the proper equipment there, and to give them expensive craft in which they may go ashore and be brought back in the dignity commensurate with the position they occupy? If that is not pork, if that is justifiable, then why is it not just as reasonable to go into the small towns of the United States, where the people are taxed from day to day to carry on the Central Government and maintain it, and there construct public buildings? Why is it not justifiable to go into these communities, where these people issue bonds to erect handsome courthouses in these little towns not merely because they may have to have a handsome courthouse to do the work the court is called upon to do but because they want to beautify the town and encourage civic pride? Is it wrong to go there, where they tax themselves to try to build up better influences, in order to make better American citizens, and construct handsome post offices? If it is not wrong for this Government to tax those people to carry on these improvements in the great cities, then I resent the charges of gentlemen like the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], that the Representatives of the rural communities are here taxing these people wrongfully to give their people their full share in this Government. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Waynesboro, Ga., $25,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Amend, on page 16, by striking out lines 19 and 20.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, on October 1 last the postal receipts of Waynesboro, Ga., were only $7,452.39. This is a town of 2,729 people. The Government is now paying a rent of $400 a year, and it will cost $4,200 a year to maintain the new building.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Winnfield, La., $30,000: Provided, That a suitable site shall be conveyed to the United States by the city of Winnfield or citizens thereof, free of cost, said site to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, after line 2, insert the following: "United States post office at Woodstock, Ill., $45,000."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state in explanation that that item was inadvertently left out of the bill. It is within the district of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COPLEY]. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Bloomington, Ill., $150,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 18, strike out the figures "$150,000" and insert the figures "$185,000."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I will state in explanation of that amendment that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], who represents that district, introduced a bill asking for $150,000. The department in its report insisted upon $185,000. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] thought at that time $150,000 would be ample. He has since made investigation, and we are satisfied that $185,000, the original estimate of the department, ought to be put in the bill. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Clare, Mich., $35,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, amend by striking out line 1.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I notice that this is a Michigan item introduced by one of my colleagues [Mr. LOUD]. The original amount of the bill as introduced was $50,000. The committee has allowed $35,000. Clare, Mich., only had a population of 1,174 in 1890 and 1,326 in 1900 and 1,350 in 1910. I think we ought to have a chance, Mr. Chairman, to criticize undesirable items like this, and I am glad therefore that resolution 400, sponsored by the Public Buildings Committee, and which would have prevented my offering this amendment, was not reported out by the Rules Committee. There is no reason that a town, whether it is in Michigan, Maine, Alabama, or Kentucky, or where it is located, and which only increased 24 in 10 years, that only had postal receipts of $8,590 at the time the bill was introduced by my colleague, is entitled to a $35,000 post office. The bill as introduced would necessitate an expenditure of $3,600 for maintenance, including interest, depreciation of the building and furniture, janitor, heat, electric light, etc., or practically three-fourths of the postal receipts of that town. The rent now being paid is $549.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What did the gentleman say the receipts were in 1915?

Mr. JAMES. Eight thousand five hundred and ninety dollars on January 1, 1916.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I beg the gentleman's pardon; they were $10,017.88.

Mr. JAMES. The statement I hold from the Treasury Department——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I got mine from the Post Office Department.

Mr. JAMES. Yes; and when the gentleman's hearings were held, and when Congressmen appeared before the committee on behalf of any item, they quoted to you figures furnished them by the Treasury Department.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. These were the exact figures we had.

Mr. JAMES. So, according to the figures prepared by the Treasury Department, this town had postal receipts of only $8,590.91 on January 1, 1916. I do not believe the people of Clare themselves want a post office of that kind—$35,000.

As I stated, the rent is now only $549. The interest on the proposed $35,000, at 3 per cent, would be $1,050. Judging from the experience of the Government, it will cost $960 for janitor, fireman, and scrub woman. In addition, it would cost $900 each year for fuel, electric light, etc. And judging from the experience of the Government at Newark, N. Y., these figures are correct. For the fiscal year of 1916 at Newark, N. Y., the expenses were as follows:

Light	$303.43
Heat	438.31
Water	24.38
Miscellaneous items	80.92
Ice	15.25
Removing ashes and rubbish	21.75
Washing towels	9.37
Total	893.41

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I notice that my colleague from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] is not on the floor. This town is in his district, and as Mr. LOUD is not here I want to say to my colleague [Mr. JAMES] that I know something about the village or city of Clare, which, I think, perhaps might throw a little light upon the subject of its population. The city of Clare lies partly in Isabella County and partly in Clare County. Now, as I recollect it, only that portion of the city that lies in Clare County is included in the city limits. There are some five or six hundred people who are actually inhabitants of the city of Clare living just across the county line in Isabella County, but are not included in the census for the city of Clare. I think perhaps that will explain the matter of population. This is quite a rapidly growing, flourishing community in the central part of Michigan. I know if my colleague [Mr. LOUD] were here he could give the House more exact information, but a good many years ago I used to teach school at Mr. Pleasant, which is a near-by city, and I know quite a bit about the locality and the location of the town. I particularly recall that it is partly in one county and partly in another, and the portion in Isabella County does not lie within the corporate limits of the city.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman say the population of Clare has increased?

Mr. KELLEY. Oh, yes; I am sure it has increased, but what I am saying particularly is that the figures given by my colleague [Mr. JAMES] may mislead the House as to the actual population of Clare, because perhaps five or six hundred people live across the county line who are not included in the figures which he gave.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Michigan is a highly respected Member of this House and I would take his word on the question. Does the gentleman think there is a necessity for a new post office?

Mr. KELLEY. I would not go as far as to say that. I have not been in Clare for a good many years. I am only directing my remarks to the question of population, which I wanted to state correctly as I understand it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The rest of the Members are not informed in this matter. Does the gentleman think that item ought to be stricken out?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not. The chairman of the committee [Mr. CLARK] has stated that the receipts of the office of Clare are above $10,000 and I do not see any reason why the item should be stricken out, if other towns where the receipts are no greater are left in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to strike out.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Circleville, Ohio, $65,000.

Mr. RICKETTS. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill providing an appropriation for the erection of public buildings and the purchase of grounds as sites whereon to erect public buildings, and to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, and to abolish the Office of Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and create and organize in the Treasury Department a bureau of public buildings, and to define its duties, powers, and jurisdiction, and to create and establish the office of commissioner of public buildings, and to create a board of estimates and prescribe its duties and powers, and for other purposes therein mentioned, is not unlike numerous bills of similar character that have been passed by the House of Representatives for many years past.

The last public-buildings bill passed by Congress was approved by the President on March 4, 1913, and carried authorizations which in the aggregate amounted to approximately $40,000,000. Since that time the growth of the country in population, in wealth, and in business, manufacturing, and industrial enterprises has been so great as to increase tremendously the demand for new, enlarged, and better facilities for the economic and efficient transaction of public business throughout the country. Every line of Federal activity has kept pace with the progress of the age, and to-day in very many of the cities and towns of the country the public business is being conducted in such very crowded, ill-ventilated, and unsanitary quarters as not only to reduce materially the efficiency of the employees but seriously jeopardize their health.

I think all of the Members of this House will agree with me that such conditions should not be permitted to continue, and while this bill does not seek to remedy all the existing evils, a great many of them will be remedied should this bill be enacted into law.

The Government should transact its business in a businesslike manner, and this bill is a long step toward placing the building operations of the Government on a sound, sensible, economic, and businesslike basis.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The bill provides for the abolition of the Office of Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and creates in lieu thereof a bureau of public buildings, placing at the head of such bureau an officer to be known as the commissioner of public buildings, who is to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who is to hold office for a term of four years. This bureau of public buildings is given complete jurisdiction over and control of the selection of sites, drafting of plans and specifications, supervision of construction, and the care and maintenance of all public buildings.

I consider this a wise step in legislation.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] on last Tuesday, during the public debate of this bill, in a very clear, concise, and pointed manner explained to this House why this provision was a wise one. I most heartily concur, if I may be allowed to do so, in his deductions and conclusions, with reference to the Treasury Department's failure to transact and carry on the public-buildings business of this Government. I think this department well deserves to be criticized for its failure to conduct the public-buildings business in a businesslike manner. The Treasury Department relies altogether on the Supervising Architect to determine the sites where public buildings shall be erected, and decide the size, kind, and class of public buildings that shall be erected thereon. His judgment in the past has been greatly criticized by the business men of the various cities and towns of the country wherein Government buildings have been erected, and I think justly so.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

I hope the time may come when this Government will own its own post-office building in each and every city and town throughout the country where the post-office receipts are $10,000 and upward annually.

This Government has been paying enormous rents for the use of post-office buildings for many years, and has been compelled to use and occupy buildings that were not adapted to the business for which they have been used.

REVENUE.

The Post Office Department during the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, collected in revenue from the sale of stamps, money-order business, and postal-savings business the sum of $312,057,688.83. This enormous sum is a tax paid by the people for the purpose of raising revenue in order to carry on and conduct in a legitimate manner the post-office business throughout the country. The expenditures in carrying on the post-office business during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, were the sum of $287,248,165.27, which leaves a surplus or excess over and above expenditures of $24,809,523; so it is plain to be seen that this is an important branch of Government business. And not only so, but it is a thriving, growing business. The receipts for the last fiscal year are the highest in the history of the country. Since 1800 the post-office business in the United States has gradually and constantly grown. There is no branch of the business of this Government in which the people of the country are more directly interested. It is through this branch of Government business that the industrial and commercial business of the country is carried on, and therefore the facilities and necessary equipment to successfully prosecute the business should be provided by the Government. The people pay the bill. Why not, then, give them the benefit?

In my judgment, in enacting this bill into law we will be rendering a great public service that will be beneficial, profitable, and entirely satisfactory, as well as appreciated by many of the people throughout the United States.

PORK.

Nearly all the great cities of the United States have been provided with public buildings, and consequently many Members from these cities are not interested in the passage of this bill.

Some of the editors of the press of the country have criticized this measure severely and have designated it as what is commonly known as "pork." I think this criticism, in a very large measure, is unjust and unfair. The criticism comes, of course, from the cities which have already been supplied with public buildings. It is a selfish criticism, to say the least of it.

My support of this bill is in no way influenced by the criticism lodged against it by the great cities now enjoying the occupancy and benefits of Government public buildings.

I have read this bill through and through carefully, and while I am willing to concede that there are some items in it that might have been omitted, yet the bill as a whole can not be honestly designated as "pork." It is a meritorious bill, and, in my judgment, should receive the support of a majority of the Members of this House.

There is scarcely a bill that comes before Congress that is not criticized, more or less. Each and every bill has some objectionable features, some features which might have been omitted or differently stated. I know that for several years certain metropolitan newspapers, magazines, and other publications have been loud in their denunciation of Congress for what they have been pleased to term "pork-barrel legislation." It may be true that there are in some of the omnibus bills passed by Congress a few items which on examination would appear not to have been justified, but that is not true of this bill.

As a Member of Congress I have never voted for a bill which, in my judgment, was subject to criticism as a "pork-barrel" measure. I know that men's minds differ as to the construction to be placed upon legislation. We do not all see alike. If we did, this would be rather a peculiar world.

CIRCLEVILLE.

Circleville was laid out in the year 1810 on one of the old Indian fortifications. The original town plat contained 208 private building lots, besides 5 circular and triangular areas of ground for public use. It has always been, and is still, recognized as an export city.

On the 18th day of May, 1916, I introduced in this House H. R. 15776, being a bill authorizing the acquisition of a site and the erection of a Federal public building at Circleville, Pickaway County, Ohio. In this bill I asked for an appropriation of $100,000, because I believed that the city of Circleville, being the county seat of Pickaway County, one of the most fertile counties in the State of Ohio, was justly in need of such a building and that the people of that city and county deserved it.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, under its rules, could not grant me the relief I sought in this bill, and consequently reduced the amount so as to conform the same to the rules of the committee.

Circleville has a population of approximately 8,000 people. Eight rural routes running out of Circleville serve 5,000 people, which makes a total of 13,000 people receiving mail from this office, irrespective of transients. The receipts of the post office of this city for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, were $17,000.

PRESENT POST-OFFICE BUILDING.

The present post-office quarters are in a room very much too small for the accommodation of the business. The desks and work tables are all crowded, and the employees hampered in their work.

The room is located in a building in a congested district of the city, the light of which is cut off by abutting and adjacent buildings on each side, and the building is exposed to danger by fire from all surrounding quarters. The danger from fire lessens the safety of the mails, and should a fire occur would interrupt and possibly destroy the service. The post-office building and those adjacent to it are all of the old type of architecture and none of them are fireproof.

It is necessary to work the mails by artificial light, both day and night. There are 23 gas jets or burners in operation in the post-office room, which consume the oxygen in the room in winter and in summer they create such heat as to greatly diminish the capacity and efficiency of those employed in discharging the duties of the office.

The ventilation in this room is bad, and there are no modern conveniences.

There is no place for the mail carriers to hitch their horses or leave their vehicles, and some of the carriers are obliged to leave their vehicles a distance of a block from the post office.

The building is heated by two unsanitary natural-gas stoves.

It is now necessary to rent safety-deposit boxes outside of the post office for the safeguarding of the stamps.

There are no quarters for the shelter or convenience of the city carriers in the interval between their trips, and they are, therefore, left to shift for themselves, which results in great inconvenience and discomfort to the carriers, especially in inclement weather.

It is certainly conclusive evidence, from the above facts and beyond dispute that the erection of a Federal building in Circleville is an urgent necessity, for the proper transaction and execution of the business of the Government and for the service and accommodation of the citizens of the city, and the patrons of its post office.

Circleville is one of the most beautiful and enterprising county seats in the State of Ohio. Its residences and public buildings are modern, massive, and picturesque. It contains many substantial, modern, and attractive business blocks.

The following summary of statistics will give you some idea of the commercial and industrial activities of the citizens of this city and some idea of its wealth:

This beautiful city has 5 miles of paved streets and 30 miles of improved streets.

The city building represents an investment of	$20,000
Memorial Hall	35,000
Opera house	25,000
Hospital and Old Ladies' Home	23,000
Fire department	50,000
Public library, containing 2,000 volumes, which has just received a cash bequest of	10,000
City school buildings	250,000
New hospital	35,000
Courthouse, jail, and sheriff's residence	300,000
Churches aggregating an investment of	302,000
Masonic Temple	35,000
Odd Fellows Building	30,000
Knights of Pythias Temple	30,000
Elks Building	10,000
Athletic Club	25,000
Weil Building	50,000
Traction station	20,000

This city has the largest horse market in the State of Ohio. It has the largest straw-board plant in the world, which embraces 47 acres of land, more than 10 acres of which are covered with buildings.

This city has the greatest export canned-goods trade in the United States. The approximate export trade is 23,000,000 cans annually, which are distributed to all parts of the globe.

Circleville has a large milling interest which manufactures and exports hundreds of carloads of meal annually. It has large manufacturing interests.

The tax duplicate of this city shows an aggregate sum of $8,265,270.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Co.'s local business at Circleville in 1915 amounted to $55,600.

The Norfolk & Western Railroad Co. in 1915 delivered 5,239 carloads of freight in this city.

PICKAWAY COUNTY.

Circleville is the county seat of Pickaway County, Ohio. Pickaway (or Piqua) is an Indian name. It is said to have been the name of a numerous family of the Shawnee Tribe of Indians who occupied the Pickaway plains at an early period. The meaning of the word is unknown to the whites, though it had undoubtedly a significant meaning, as all Indian names had.

The name was given by law to the county, though originally it had been confined to the plains in the southern part of the county. These plains bore that name among the Indians when the whites first entered the country or knew anything about it.

Pickaway County is 22 by 21 miles in extent, and contains about 470 square miles. This county contains the Pickaway plains, and is one of the most fertile counties in the State of Ohio, rich in the production of corn, wheat, cattle, horses, swine, and all other agricultural products. It has a tax duplicate value of $42,054,895.

Can any Member of this House, in good conscience, say, in the face of the above statistical facts, that this city and county should not have an appropriation of $65,000 for a Government post office building?

These people are progressive, industrious, and enterprising, and, as their Representative in this House, I have used every honorable means to bring about this appropriation.

Nearly every class of citizenship represented in this city and county, including the merchants, the professional men, the newspaper men, the political parties, the secret organizations, the Christian people, the Chamber of Commerce, the ministers of the Gospel, the bankers, the farmers, the laboring classes, and the citizenship generally, have petitioned Congress, through me, to grant them this appropriation, and I am endeavoring to impress you with my loyalty to their cause.

I sincerely hope that this House may see its way clear to pass this bill.

It is true that this city and county are in the district which I have the honor to represent, and I have pledged my word to those people to leave no stone unturned to secure for them the Federal building which they so much desire and deserve.

The county seats in every county bounding Pickaway now have public buildings, given them by an appropriation made through Congress, and it is only fair to the good people of Circleville and Pickaway County that they be accorded the same consideration that Congress has heretofore given to the adjoining counties and county seats.

If there is one official act that I hope to perform to the satisfaction of those concerned before the expiration of my term in this House, it is to secure for the people of Circleville and Pickaway County a Federal post office building. I assured these people that I would do everything in my power to secure this building for them, and I am trying my best to fulfill my promise.

I know that some of the Members of this House for selfish reasons alone are against this bill. You say it is "pork." You must have some excuse for your action. At the last session of this Congress some of you who are objecting to this bill voted for the rivers and harbors appropriation of $43,000,000, and in this session of Congress you are preparing yourselves to again vote for an additional appropriation of $38,000,000, under the guise that you must conserve the great fertile valley of the Mississippi. You know that this bill is a meritorious one, and you know that you should support it.

Section 15 of this bill provides:

That it shall be the duty of the custodians of all public buildings of the United States of America and all buildings in which is located a post office of the United States to raise over such building the flag of the United States of America on each secular day when weather conditions are favorable. It shall be the duty of any department of the Government under which division said buildings or post offices are controlled to provide any such building a suitable flag for the purposes herein provided.

I am heartily in accord with this provision of the bill, and I hope that I may live to see the day when that grand old emblem of freedom, with her 7 red and 6 white stripes and 48 stars may be unfurled to the American people from these buildings, and that Circleville may have one of the new buildings in this Union, whose citizens may enjoy and appreciate the sight, fully realizing that Congress at last has recognized their claim and has given them what they honestly need and justly deserve. [Applause.]

United States post office at Council Grove, Kans., $35,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 18, by striking out lines 8 and 9.

Mr. FREAR. So far as the record goes, it is no different than the preceding 12 building items which have just been read, which, according to the Government, will be maintained at a loss. Council Grove had 2,545 inhabitants at the last census, $9,041 receipts, and $540 rent, and will cost the Government $3,500 annually to maintain a building after it is built. I do not rise to discuss that proposition alone. The gentleman who last spoke says that the common people of America are to be benefited by this bill. I would like to ask him to consider whether the farmers of his district and throughout the United States, who have about one-third of the population in this country and pay their share of direct and indirect taxes, are to be benefited particularly by this bill, which contains 200 items that the Treasury Department says will be at a loss? If they are, then how and where?

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. My friend from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] just had handed to him a note which reads as follows:

When we get through with buildings why not submit an amendment to put a $30,000 post office in every city of the United States having $10,000 receipts?

Such an amendment would not be as ridiculous as the rest of the bill necessarily. I have right here the report of the Public Buildings Commission on that very point, which I referred to once before. On page 77 occurs this statement:

There are 508 cities in the United States which had post-office receipts of $10,000 and over—

Remember, this report was made since the last public-building bill was passed—in 1913, towns which were not provided with post-office buildings.

* * * * * * *

Fifteen States have no post offices with receipts of $10,000 or over without post-office buildings.

And it gives a list of them.

Among the 30 States that have will be found 77 cities in Pennsylvania of over $10,000 receipts that were not provided for four years ago. New York had 56 cities that were not provided for; Illinois had 30 cities of over $10,000 receipts at that time that have not been provided for. Wisconsin had 22 unprovided. And so continues the statement, showing the whereabouts of all the different cities now unprovided.

I submit that this note which comes to my friend from Michigan may be suggestive of a good argument in favor of taking care of those 508 cities which at that time were not provided with public buildings. They could be taken care of in this bill at this particular time, if good business required, when the Treasury faces a $300,000,000 deficit. I say, if those items already provided for in this bill are proper, why not put all such projects in here as well as the few that have been selected geographically and mathematically here and there?

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman kindly state for the benefit of the House who signed that note?

Mr. FREAR. I have no idea. It makes no difference. It is the text, which I ask the gentleman to take home to himself, and answer, if he can, on the floor of the House. Why not put the 508 places that are equally just, according to the committee, all in the bill?

Mr. AUSTIN. Would that include the two the gentleman offered?

Mr. KING. Why not offer an amendment?

Mr. FREAR. I do not believe it is right in either case.

Mr. RICKETTS. The gentleman knows this is not new legislation, but has been going on for a number of years.

Mr. FREAR. You will never get rid of it with the argument the gentleman offered on the floor. We must uproot a bad system if we meet the matter squarely.

Mr. KING. What would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. FREAR. I have suggested a number of times different plans advanced by those who have given this question much study. I can not discuss the matter in the limited time I have.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand the gentleman thinks we ought to put 508 other items in the bill?

Mr. FREAR. No; I do not. I am frank to say no. But with equal justice I say it could be done with many items that are in this bill now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], so far as the argument just made is concerned, but I am thankful to him for having called attention to the fact that in Pennsylvania and certain other large States there are many cities qualified under this bill to receive post offices that have not yet obtained one. And, basing what I have to say upon that premise, without any feeling at all, and with a desire to be perfectly fair, I want to relate a little personal experience with regard to measures of this kind.

When I came into the House 10 years ago I came believing that a great river that flows by my city had not been properly taken care of by Congress, and I undertook individually to do some things to obtain an improvement of that river. It was not long before I found that there were many other rivers in the United States demanding attention; that there were 50,000 miles of navigable rivers, one-half of them unimproved; and that I could not get separate provision for my river unless other Members of Congress obtained some consideration for theirs. And it was an eye opener to me—which, I assume, it will be in due course to other new Members of Congress—that no particular individual can come into this House charged with a feeling of injustice, and run away with his own particular improvement to the prejudice of other improvements throughout the country that may be equally deserving with his. [Applause.]

And so I have come to be liberal with respect to the treatment of river and harbor bills, and so I want to be liberal with respect to this public-buildings bill. We are interested in Pennsylvania in several items in this bill. I am particularly interested in a bill to provide a customhouse site for the great city of Philadelphia. We have been waiting since Andrew Jackson broke the United States Bank to obtain this customhouse at Philadelphia—a customhouse which in normal times turns into the Treasury of the United States $20,000,000 a year in revenue—but because there are other sections of the country, growing in population, which demand consideration in the matter of public buildings, and which are deserving, we have been postponed in this ambition and necessity of ours, lo, these 75 years.

It is not because individual bills have not been introduced. It is not because committees have not favorably considered this particular project. It is because in the very nature of things, by reason of the population of the country, there are other sections demanding consideration along with us; and I want to say to my friends who have been opposing this bill—I hope and believe in good faith—and to those who have said that their particular projects are all right, but that all other particular projects are all wrong—I want to say to them that a longer experience in this House and a closer association with the Members who come up from Louisiana and over from California and down from Maine will convince every one of them that there is virtue in the claims made by our colleagues and that we are not ourselves the only pure and sanctified Members of this House. [Applause.]

I say this respectfully, because I know that many new Members come into this House with an indignation born of too much magazine reading, some of them impelled by a desire to crush the mythical octopus in Congress, or others possibly to shine in the public eye as great reformers. I know, as every other Member of the House knows, that this is a great equalizing and leveling body and that here all men stand on a par and each project stands upon its merits. I have respect for and confidence in the committee, and I trust that we may proceed speedily to the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a pro forma amendment to strike out the last word, just to say a word.

I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and am interested in what he has said for your consideration. I have been acquainted with public-building bills and river and harbor bills for, lo, these many years. Frankly, I could pick out his project and the Chicago project and a few others that did not pass without other Members who have constituencies being interested. I am not an enemy of public buildings, nor am I an enemy of river and harbor improvements. You have to take the world as you find it, and where there is a large expenditure made, as there is in this country now, with appropriations amounting annually to a billion and a half dollars plus, with an absolute necessity for legislation at this or a near-by session for any increase of taxation, with authority to borrow, the only serious criticism that I have to offer to this bill at this time is that, under present conditions and the existing situation, it is not apt.

You on that side are responsible for legislation. I could pick out this and that and the other item, if it stood by itself, that probably ought not to go into this bill. But it is up to that side of the House to consider it. This side of the House is in the minority. We can vote almost any old way [laughter], and if it turns out that this is not a proper thing to do, you have got to take the responsibility. I will say frankly that if I had my way about it I would postpone the passage of this bill until there is a different condition in the Treasury. But if you make up your minds that under all these conditions this bill should be passed, you have the power to pass it with or without the help of the minority.

I think if I were of the majority I would counsel the defeat of this bill at this time without taking time to criticize this thing or that thing or the other thing in connection with it. I expect I am about as anxious as any man in the House that we should avoid a special session. I do not see what we have to gain by it, or what you have to gain by it, or what the country has to gain by it. [Applause.] I would be glad if before this Congress adjourns you will take the proper steps to procure needed revenues by what you call indirect taxation at the customhouse. [Applause on the Republican side.] I will not agree, I apprehend, with the revenue legislation that you are to propose, and I stand for the economic policy of the Republican Party and would procure a large part of the revenue needed, inasmuch as you have not cheapened the cost of living, by proper taxation at the customhouse.

Possibly you will not agree to that proposition; I think probably you will not, if we can trust the newspaper accounts. But, still, whatever provision you make in the near future, whatever bonds shall be issued, whatever Treasury notes bearing 3 per cent shall be issued, I hope you will provide for it. It is to the common interest of all the country. Although your taxation that you may provide is unjust and unwise from my standpoint, yet I hope you will provide it, because it is to the best interest from every standpoint that you should provide for it. That is all I want to say about this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and courthouse and other Government offices at Greenwood, S. C., $125,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell the present Federal building and site at public sale for cash to the highest bidder, after due advertisement in a newspaper published in the city of Greenwood, S. C., once a week for four successive weeks, conveying the same to the purchaser by the usual quitclaim deed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 20, line 9, after the word "deed," insert the words "and pay the proceeds of such sale into the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 20, line 5, after the word "public," strike out the remainder of the line and all of lines 6 and 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "or private sale, but at not less than the value as determined by an appraisal thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, the committee have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. This amendment is in harmony with the other provision which was adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office, mine rescue station, and other Government offices at Hazard, Ky., $40,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, strike out lines 15 and 16.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion with some embarrassment, because this is one of the few items as to which I happen to know who is the Representative offering it. I will say that I have not imputed any unfair motives to any Member in introducing any one of these measures or to the committee in carrying them out. This bill is the only vehicle by which at this time you can get these things. The omnibus bill is responsible for the situation. I will say also to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that I am not trying to filibuster, nor has there been any such intention of such purpose at any time. We are pointing out specific cases and reasons for opposing particular items, and it would not be fair to the people of this country if we did not state our reasons, because afterwards the question will be offered, "Why did you not point them out?"—the bad items. There are a couple of hundred in this bill that the Treasury Department says are wasteful. I am only discussing a few that are typical of scores in the bill.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It is possible that my utterance was misunderstood. I justify any parliamentary method that will put an end to this sort of legislation.

Mr. FREAR. I would not attempt to filibuster, and I never have done so, on this or any other bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will my friend yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly; but I want to read the data on this item, and then I will yield to my friend from Kentucky.

In 1910 this town of Hazard, Ky., had a population of 537. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] says it has now increased to 4,000, which I will concede for the sake of argument. The postal receipts for 1915 were $4,477. For the sake of the argument I will also concede that receipts have now reached more than $10,000. The Government pays $250 a year rent, and I will not concede that it pays any more than that, and if such is the case it is a waste of money to compel the Government to pay a cost of maintenance estimated at $3,800, which is about fifteen times the amount of the rental we have to pay at Hazard.

Now, just a word as to mine interests. There are hundreds of cities in this country that have mine interests, where mine rescue stations might with equal propriety be established. It has been suggested here that the only purpose of a mine-rescue station is to inform people as to proper methods of safeguard and rescue, and that when they have once been educated and trained a permanent building is not needed. Why should there be a permanent mine-rescue station there any more than at 50 or 100 places in Pennsylvania, or 50 places in Montana or California or other States where they have vast mining interests, particularly in Pennsylvania? Why should not all of these other places have other Governmental activities or mine-rescue stations as well as Hazard?

Mr. LANGLEY. Will my friend permit me to say that at the hearing on this bill the Director of the Bureau of Mines stated fully the reasons why it was necessary to have room in the public building at Hazard for these activities. I have also inserted in the RECORD his letter to me, to which I invite the gentleman's attention. And let me say further to the gentleman that I acquit him of any intention of imputing any improper motives to anybody. He is simply not fully informed about the conditions in the mountains of eastern Kentucky.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman. I am informed, however, about the fact that $250 a year is the amount of annual rent the Government is paying to-day, and we could rent the best building in Hazard for one-quarter the cost of maintenance of the proposed building.

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will read the testimony which I inserted in the RECORD he ought to know, and will know, that we can not get insurance on the present building, which is a frame building, and wholly inadequate. It is a regular fire trap, and if it caught fire the building and everything in it would probably be a total loss.

Mr. FREAR. Let us rent the best brick or stone building in the town, which, I am sure, we can do for less than one-quarter of what the cost of maintenance will be.

Mr. LANGLEY. No; we could not. I really think the committee were very stingy with me in not giving Hazard more than $40,000, and I predict that more money will have to be provided later to afford a suitable building for the rapidly growing needs of Hazard, which is going to be a real metropolis—the "zenith city of the unconquerable mountains"—whence the course of progress in the old Commonwealth is rapidly wending its way, so that the Kentucky mountains will soon be the industrial center of that great region of country. [Applause.] I shall be satisfied for the present with the $40,000, but I give notice now that I shall ask more in a future Congress. The receipts of the post office will be over $7,000 this year and twice that in the near future.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and land office at Lewiston, Mont., $100,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 11, strike out the word "Lewiston" and insert "Lewistown."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, after line 12, insert the following:
"United States post office at Lewistown, Ill., $30,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Peru, Ill., $45,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

Page 23, line 7, strike out the figures "$45,000" and insert the figures "$50,000."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that the gentleman from Illinois who represents that district called my attention to the fact that we had not allowed as much for that town as to other places throughout the country of that size, and therefore we make this amendment to make it comport with the buildings in other places.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at Sapulpa, Okla., $70,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, amend by inserting as line 10 the following language:
"United States post office at Schuyler, Nebr., $35,000."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, that was an item inadvertently left out of the bill. It was agreed upon by the committee, but in the final draft of the bill, or in the printing, it was omitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the item is printed in the copy of the bill as a committee amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Somerset, Pa., $58,000.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I know that gentlemen have got tired of this discussion, but I want to take a brief time in which to say something about this item which is in my district. While there is no objection to it, I want to say a word about the small towns. Somerset had a population of 2,700 at the last census, but probably has a population now of 4,000 in the immediate vicinity that makes a part of the town now. The county has 67,000 people and is a going institution. It has increased from 37,000 to 67,000 in the last 20 years.

I took occasion this morning to look up something about Cedar Rapids, Iowa. That matter was up here yesterday, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and other good people are objecting here to appropriations for country towns. I find that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] lives in a city that has 32,811 people, but he lives in a county that has 60,720 people; that is, more than half of the people in that county live in his town. The county has only increased in the last 10 years 5,000 people, while the county I am speaking about, Somerset County, has increased 20,000 in the same period. The county he lives in has increased since 1890, 15,000, while the county that I represent has increased 30,000. Somerset County has a larger population than his county, and yet he would object to public buildings in such towns as this, because of their small population, rather than judge the necessity by the population of the county. I think it ought to be based on the population of the county. I think there is where we make a mistake.

The county has not a larger town than Somerset, but there are probably a dozen towns as large as that. Somerset is a magnificent little town and is the county seat. It has a courthouse costing $250,000 that the people of the county have erected and many other magnificent buildings and dwellings. So I think there is where we are making a mistake, in saying that because a town is a small one it ought not to have a post-office building, when the county may have a larger population and pay more taxes than the county in which Cedar Rapids is located. Cedar Rapids has a public building costing $350,000, while the public building asked for here is costing only $58,000, while Somerset County probably pays more taxes and has more population and is a richer county and more of a going institution than the county in which Cedar Rapids is located. Cedar Rapids is dead, the county is dead, and, in fact, Iowa is dead. [Laughter.] Iowa decreased in population 7,000 between the last census and the preceding one. Pennsylvania increased more than 1,300,000 people from 1900 to 1910, and Pennsylvania is a going State. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I regret to say this of Iowa, but they stand up here and object to everything going to Pennsylvania or in any State where there is something doing. I am sick of that sort of thing.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. What items in Pennsylvania have been objected to?

Mr. HOPWOOD. None that I know of in this particular bill. I refer to other measures. What I want to talk about are the small items for the small towns. I live in a town of 20,000 people—Uniontown; we have no public building; we had $69,000 in post-office receipts the past year. We are not asking for a Government building. We had a good citizen who built a post-office building which we occupy and which is very comfortable and commodious. This is the only public building I want in my district. I am glad that you have not objected to it. I say we are all wrong about this notion that we ought not to build public buildings in small towns. Why, if you wanted a brick building on a back street in New York you could rent it for one-tenth of what your public building costs there. Would you rent it? No. You would not do it in New York or Chicago. You talk about renting a building cheaper; it is all nonsense. I can rent a house at $25 a month, but if I am able to pay for it I want a better one than that. I built one that costs me probably $200 a month to live in, counting interest, taxes, and upkeep. But I do not count the cost of it. That does not enter into it at all. There is a comfort and satisfaction in having your own home that can not be computed in dollars. We have $200,000,000,000 of wealth in this country. Just at the present time our income is hardly sufficient to meet the outgo, but that is neither here nor there. We owe only a billion dollars, which is one-half of one per cent of our estimated wealth. What man ever accomplished anything in the world who did not owe more than one-half of 1 per cent? There is not a man before me who has ever accomplished anything in the world that has not owed ten or twenty or fifty times that amount. I say one-half of 1 per cent is nothing. Suppose we add the other half to it and make our indebtedness $2,000,000,000 and go ahead and erect these buildings, and place them in the little towns, as well as in the big cities; for the little towns have some rights which you are bound to respect. A county that has seventy-five or eighty or a hundred thousand people has some rights even if it has not put its population all in one town. That is all nonsense anyway. We want to scatter the congested population of the cities over the country. We do not want them penned up in one city or town, and you gentlemen are just working to that end, to try and make everybody live next door to his neighbor on a twenty-foot lot. I would rather live out on a twenty-five or fifty acre lot. [Applause.]

I expect to vote for this bill, and if the great metropolitan papers and magazines choose to call it pork when we appropriate $25,000 or $50,000 for a public building in a town, and statesmanship of a high order when we appropriate several hundred times that sum for one of our great cities, well and good.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the item stricken out of the bill on page 15.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Equipment shops for the Post Office Department, at Washington, D. C., $200,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, strike out all of lines 12 and 13.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I make that motion because this equipment has already been provided for in the appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at Weehawken, N. J., $125,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 15, strike out the word "Weehawken" and insert in lieu thereof the words "town of Union," and after the words "New Jersey." insert the words "for the Weehawken post office."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Albemarle, N. C., $8,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion for the purpose of calling attention to a new class of items that have now been reached in the bill and not because of any particular objection to this one item, any more than to many that have preceded it and many that will follow. I will give the figures furnished by the Post Office Department for the town of Albemarle, N. C. It has a population of 2,116, and last year had postal receipts of $8,759. The annual rent paid amounts to $606. The maintenance charge will reach $4,900.

Just one moment, now, in reply to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPWOOD] said a few moments ago. He wipes out the whole question of rent with a sweep of the hand, and states that rent is not to be considered. Here is a statement from one of the great departments of the Government, the Post Office Department, and the same is true of the Treasury Department, and the officials are looking for the dollars and cents belonging to the Government, as the gentleman would do if he occupied their positions, because I take it he is a good business man. Here is what the Postmaster General says in the public-building commission's report:

If satisfactory quarters could be rented for an amount less than this [$1,000], the construction of a public building represents a large annual loss to the Government and should not be authorized.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that is good policy, whether it is for the individual or for the Government. Now, let me read what relates more particularly to Albemarle.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. In just a moment. I am trying to give you something besides my individual opinion. On pages 68 and 69 of this report I find the following statement:

It is recommended that sites for public buildings be not authorized in advance of the authorization for the buildings. The estimated cost of sites now authorized is $11,847,492.30, of which amount there has been appropriated $5,758,992.30. It is estimated by the Supervising Architect that should buildings be authorized for the sites for which none have yet been provided, at a time which would enable the construction work to be continued without break, that at a rate of progress of 75 buildings per year, the last of the sites authorized will not be improved until about 1922. The adoption of the recommendations of this report will, however, materially increase the present yearly output of buildings.

It is urged that the Government by acquiring a site at an early date reaps the advantage of the increase in value. Sometimes the value does increase, as was the case in Birmingham, Ala., and sometimes the value very greatly decreases, as it did in Pittsburgh, Pa. The site in Pittsburgh was purchased at a cost of $942,343.91 on May 20, 1907. The public buildings act of 1913 authorized its sale for $750,000. It would seem that the Government is in exactly the same position as a private purchaser whose real estate investments sometimes increase and at other times decrease. The Government, however, has not the advantage of being able to sell quickly when it finds that property is decreasing in value. It must first go to Congress for an act which will permit the sale. Under the present plan of authorizing sites in advance of buildings the Government is required to carry several million dollars of nonincome-producing real estate for from two to six years.

Then the statement goes on to advise against the policy of purchasing sites in advance. I would suggest that a great majority of the preceding items in the bill are in this same list of wasteful proposals. However, there is no desire to obstruct legislation here or to unnecessarily occupy time. Items are asked to be stricken out whenever specific cases arise where particular rules should be applied. Other items are frequently equally bad. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOPWOOD. If rental is to be the criterion in this matter, does the gentleman not know that in any city in this land where we have expended millions of dollars to build a Government building, we could rent quarters for perhaps one-tenth of the amount?

Mr. FREAR. It is true in many cases, I believe; but I will say this: That where we have cited case after case where we are paying ten times as much for maintenance as we are for rental, it is very poor policy for either a Government or a private individual to adopt such a course. Such is the advice of this report given after great study on the subject by those who represent the Government's interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Baxley, Ga., $5,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this item, because from the report it appears that the population at the last census was 831 at Baxley. I do not know where it is located or who is its Representative. The post-office receipts were $6,639 last year, only that amount; $408 is the annual rental at Baxley, and $4,200 is more than ten times the rental now paid. That is for the average building maintenance cost that will be incurred in a place of that kind. I submit that is one of the items which seems poor business economy for the Government to engage in, particularly at this time. It is profligate waste.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Blakely, Ga., $6,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. The population of Blakely, Ga., in 1910 was 1,838. The postal receipts on January 1 last were $6,327.50. At present the Government is paying nothing for rent. The cost of maintenance of the new building will be $4,400. I wish to read regarding this matter of buying sites, from page 68 of the report of the Public Buildings Commission. This Public Building Committee was a very distinguished commisson, consisting of the following:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS COMMISSION.

Hon. William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, chairman; Hon. James C. McReynolds, Attorney General; Hon. Albert S. Burleson, Postmaster General; Senator CLAUDE A. SWANSON; Senator GEORGE SUTHERLAND; Representative FRANK CLARK; Representative RICHARD W. AUSTIN; Sherman Allen, assistant to the chairman; Jay F. Durham, secretary.

In many instances the authorization for the purchase of the site has been made a commitment——

Mr. CRAMTON. If I may interrupt the gentleman at that point. A few minutes ago the gentleman referred to a rule, sponsored by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with reference to debate upon the bill. Was that a different rule from the rule under which we are proceeding?

Mr. JAMES. It was.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would ask if the gentleman would, in extending his remarks, insert the rule to which he referred. I am not asking him to read it here.

Mr. JAMES. The rule, as introduced by the committee, provided for two hours' debate to be controlled by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] and two hours by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] at the end of which time general debate would close, and the only amendments which may be offered may be committee amendments. There would be no discussion of other amendments, and no one but a member of the committee could offer an amendment or even talk on any amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman kindly insert the rule in his extension?

Mr. JAMES. I shall be pleased to do so. The full rule, which is House Rule No. 400, reads as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17052) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, etc.; that in the committee the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with; that there shall be not to exceed two hours of general debate to be under the control of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] and two hours of general debate to be under the control of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], said debate to be confined to the subject matter of the bill; that at the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read by paragraphs for committee amendments and no others; that at the conclusion of such reading the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and amendments to final passage.

In many instances the authorization for the purchase of a site has been made as a commitment on the part of the Government to the ultimate erection of a public building. Since towns and cities often change rapidly, especially in the West, in increase or decrease, this has many disadvantages. This was the case at Goldfield, Nev., where a site and building was authorized May 30, 1908, at a cost of $75,000, but has not yet been erected—

At that time Goldfield had a population of about 18,000, and in 1910 it had, I understand, about 5,000. And, I may say, the Government has not even seen fit to buy the site—

There can be scarcely any advantage in the practice to the Government unless it be that the early authorization permits the acquiring of title in ample time for building operations. The acquiring of the title by the Government takes an average of six months to nine months.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Charleston, Mo., $5,000.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 10, after the word "office," insert the words "and other Government offices."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There is no objection to that.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Corvallis, Oreg., $10,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 20, strike out the period and insert a comma and add: "And for the erection of a post-office building, $60,000."

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, Corvallis is a substantial, well-built, prosperous, modern city. It is situated in a fertile, populous, farming section; is the county seat of Benton County and the seat of the Oregon Agricultural College. The enterprising citizens of Corvallis believe that a public building is greatly needed there, because of the inadequacy of the present postal facilities, the location of the post office at one side of the town, and for other reasons which I will give a little later. They earnestly desire that provision be made in the pending bill for a building for that city. All requirements are fully met. The bill carries an appropriation of $10,000 for the acquisition of a site.

The amendment I have offered provides for the construction of a building upon the site at a cost of $60,000.

The postal receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, were $27,176.15, and for the first six months of the present fiscal year were $13,749.54. The receipts are nearly three times the minimum requirement.

Prior to January 17, 1917, the rent paid was $1,260, but on January 18, 1917, the rent was increased to $1,800 per annum. This increase indicates the normal steady increase of rental values, due to the growth of the city; and rent charges will continually increase.

Under date of March 23, 1912, the Corvallis Business Men's Association estimated the population as 7,400. Taking into consideration the growth of the city and its environs directly served from the post office, the present population is much larger.

By the time a building authorized in this bill is ready for occupancy the receipts in the Corvallis office will be from $35,000 to $40,000 or more and the population served over 10,000.

The Oregon Agricultural College, located here, has a plant valued at over $2,500,000 and a very large attendance. The business of the college, that of its student body, and of parents who move in to send their children to the college increase the revenues of the office, as well as add to the demands on the post office now inadequate for proper service.

I think this showing clearly establishes the necessity and propriety of the amendment I have offered. I trust the distinguished chairman of the committee will see his way clear to indorse the amendment, and that the committee will adopt it. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I certainly will have to object to the amendment. There is no question that Corvallis, Oreg., is in the condition of hundreds of others. It is utterly impossible to take care of another place in the gentleman's district. We have provided a site at Corvallis, and that was all the committee thought in good conscience the bill at that time could provide for that place. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Covington, Ga., $5,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 21, insert "United States post office at Crosby, N. Dak., $5,000.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Hartsville, S. C., $5,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 6, insert the following: "United States post office at Harvard, Ill., $10,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Henderson, Tex., $5,000.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. The postal receipts were $6,666. The present rent of the building is $300. Its maintenance now will be $3,400. On page 68, referring to this matter of sites, the postal commission states:

It is recommended that sites for public buildings be not authorized in advance of the authorization for the buildings. The estimated cost of sites now authorized is $11,847,492.30, of which amount there has been appropriated $5,758,992.30. It is estimated by the Supervising Architect that should buildings be authorized for the sites for which none have yet been provided, at a time which would enable the construction work to be continued without break, that at a rate of progress of 75 buildings per year the last of the sites authorized will not be improved until about 1922. The adoption of the recommendations of this report will, however, materially increase the present yearly output of buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Kansas City, Mo., $1,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida, the chairman of the committee, offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, between lines 18 and 19, insert:
"United States post office at Klamath Falls, Oreg., $10,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

There has been so much criticism about different items in this bill that I think it is possibly due at this time to say something about necessary items. The last item we have just passed over was for the purchase of the site at Kansas City. The committee will observe it was only for a post office, and yet, of course, there are a great many Government activities in Kansas City. The fact about the matter is this: The present building in Kansas City, which is used for the post office and customhouse and United States courts, and so on, was completed in 1900. It cost a total of a little over $1,500,000, including the site. To-day the site could be sold for more money than the building and site cost, if the Government chose to dispose of it.

When I first looked into this matter in 1910, and it became apparent that we needed more space for post-office activities in Kansas City, we exhausted every device of the Supervising Architect's Office to see whether we could not enlarge that post-office building and keep up with the postal growth in Kansas City. We found it was utterly impossible to do so. When that building was completed in 1900 the postal receipts of Kansas City were $600,000. The last fiscal year they were over $3,000,000. There has been an increase of 500 per cent in 16 years, and the department found it was utterly impossible to enlarge the building upon the present site and keep pace with the growth of the postal business of the Southwest.

Now, of course you understand that the business done in Kansas City in a postal way embraces 1,500 miles of territory. Not only that, but it is the center of a very large territory of Government activities. For instance, the new grain-grading department has an office there, the United States courts and the Department of Justice, with its white-slave prosecutions and habit-forming drug prosecutions, is located there, and the office of the special examiners of the Pension Office is located there. In addition to that, we have the Interstate Commerce Commission, with its valuation of the railroads in 12 different States. We have the River and Harbor Board, which occupies an entire floor of the building. I found the Government was paying $50,000 a year rent outside of the present building for Government quarters and was facing a payment of $2,000 or $3,000 in the immediate future for additional rent. It will soon reach an amount of about $55,000 annually outside of the present building. That presented a situation, with the growth of the parcel post and the blue-tag mail and the wide distribution of territory over which it must be distributed from Kansas City, that appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury as a typical point at which to illustrate a new line of departure in Government buildings. I know the committee will be interested in the solution of this problem.

We propose now to use the uptown office, the one that is now used as a post office and customhouse, exclusively for customhouse, United States court, and United States offices, with a small branch post office for down-town purposes. We propose to buy a site under this bill adjacent to the new Union Station, where all of the 21 different railroads that reach Kansas City enter. We propose to use that building purely as an office building. It will not be a Greek temple, it will not be purely an ornamental structure, but it will have all the floor space that can possibly be built upon that amount of ground. It will be an office such as any business man here would build for business purposes. It will be as much a business building as are built by the express companies adjacent to the railroad companies for their business. We expect to have all the receipts of the mails taken to that building direct from the train, as they are in New York or Washington. We expect the distribution of some 50 or 60 substations to be made there, including Kansas City, Kans., which has 100,000 people, across the line. We expect all the collections of the mail to be brought in there and loaded on the cars. We do not expect to move the blue-tag mail at all.

Mr. FREAR. Where is this?

Mr. BORLAND. At Kansas City, and adjacent to the Union Station.

I will explain that idea. When the Secretary of the Treasury came out there with the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Newton, he came for the express purpose of seeing if that plan was feasible; and in his annual report he mentioned this plan as a new one that the Government proposed to follow in all cases where terminal stations were possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. The Government instead of trying to build a monumental structure in some place in the congested down-town, high-priced district intends in this case—and, I think, in several typical cases in the future—to go adjacent to the railroad track and build a purely business building, a building which will embrace all the working space that it is possible to get for the appropriation, and with the amount of ground; and it proposes to use all of that space for the transaction of Government business. The saving will be not only a saving in rent by moving the uptown office and using that for Government offices now being housed elsewhere but the saving will be in the transportation of the mail to and from the uptown office—a very large item—and the saving will also be in time of the collection and distribution of the mail. So that the mail going out from Kansas City over that territory of the Southwest will be more rapidly handled than it ever has been handled before.

Now, we are coming to a time when the parcel post will cut a large figure in the mail distribution. I can not conceive how in any great city like Kansas City or Chicago or any central mailing points we can very long continue to collect the parcel post at a central downtown office. I think we will have in all cases that have not terminal post offices, offices which will be devoted to the heavy, bulky mail, and at which the collection and distribution of the mail will occur. If this plan is carried out and made a success, as I am confident it will be, it will set an example for a reform in office buildings for the Government. It will be, so far as I know, outside of New York City, the first business building devoted wholly to postal purposes of the United States. That is the occasion for our making this only for a post office. The other activities then will be housed in the old building, and the old building will be devoted to Government offices that are now needed in that city.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The building referred to by the gentleman, in New York City, erected by the Government, adjoining the Pennsylvania Terminal Station, was opened to the public some seven years ago. It was authorized in the Post Office appropriation bill some 10 years back, and yet the Post Office Department approved of that character of accommodation for the disposal and handling of the mail in a large city, but we do not find it being duplicated in any other city during these 10 years except now in the recommendation carried in this bill for Kansas City.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, I will say to the gentleman that whatever has been done elsewhere, I studied this situation from the local and national standpoint, and took it up with the department officers, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Assistant Secretary, and the Supervising Architect, and we arrived at a plan in Kansas City that I am willing to stand on before this House.

Mr. STAFFORD. In this instance is not the delay occasioned to this much-needed reform in the handling of the mail in our large cities due to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has this in charge rather than the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, who is in direct control of the disposition of the postal needs of the country?

Mr. BORLAND. I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman would study the conditions, the proof will show that it is so.

Mr. BORLAND. I will answer the gentleman. Whenever a recommendation is made for a building it is referred to the Postmaster General.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BORLAND. In a moment. The gentleman will find in the report here a recommendation from the Postmaster General which follows exactly what I am describing here.

Mr. STAFFORD. The location of the site in these public buildings is never referred to the Postmaster General.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Lewisburg, Pa., $10,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in line 4, page 30. I offer an amendment to strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$16,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 30, line 4, by striking out "$10,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$16,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment printed in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 30, strike out line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Manning, S. C., $5,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the item, Manning, S. C.; and I only speak of this because it is one among many others that have small receipts—had a population of 1,854 souls in 1910. The postal receipts last year were $5,435.28. The annual rental is $550. The proposed annual maintenance, as estimated by the Treasury Department, reaches $4,000; in other words, eight times the present rental will be the cost.

While speaking about this item, which is only one of many items that we have, I want to call attention to the last item which was read, which I did not move to strike out because there was no particular object in so doing. At Mangum, Okla., the annual rental paid by the Government is $121, whereas the department estimates that the cost of the building to be maintained in that town would be $4,800 a year, or forty times as much as the Government is now paying at Mangum, Okla. Think of that for a building investment by the Government!

I am speaking more particularly, however, as to Manning, S. C., where the receipts are only a little over $5,000, according to this report. Many of the places we have passed have only $5,000 or $6,000 annual receipts, and are far below the $10,000 which is supposed to govern such items.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a statement from the Post Office authorities, in which they say the receipts last year at Manning were $5,846.33, instead of $5,435.28, as the gentleman from Wisconsin stated. It also shows that during the last four quarters the post-office receipts there were $6,217, showing that this post office falls within the rule that has been established by the committee—that it would grow into the class where a building would be allowed. The report of the receipts for the last quarter is $1,630.35. Manning is situated in one of the most prosperous sections of my State, in the cotton and tobacco belt.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further. I want to conclude my statement.

Mr. WHALEY. I thought you had yielded the floor.

Mr. FREAR. No; only to the gentleman for a question. I do not concede that $6,000 is a proper amount. I admit that the gentleman is within the rule from what he says, but I do not believe it can be justified in any case.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at O'Neill, Nebr., $6,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Page 31, line 16, after the word "office," insert the words "and land office."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at Owenton, Ky., $7,500.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. This item, which I move to strike out, is, according to the statement I have before me, for a village of 1,024 people in 1910, and the annual receipts, according to the statement, the last report, were $4,368.68. The annual rental is $440.

The estimated cost of maintenance was $4,300—about ten times the amount of rental.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question solely for information.

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have noticed that every time one of these smaller items is called up here the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] or the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] would say that the receipts of the post office were $4,000 or $6,000, or whatever the amount was, that the rent was $300, that the cost of the building was $30,000 or $40,000, and that the annual expense of keeping up one of these small post offices will be $4,000 a year. How does the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else figure that out?

Mr. FREAR. I inquired about that, and I was informed that they average the maintenance from the character of buildings that are ordinarily placed in towns of that size; and, as I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, a standardization for a building of that type is to be attempted.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How can they figure it out? What are the items included in maintenance?

Mr. FREAR. I have them all here, as furnished by the department. I placed the items which go to make up estimates for maintenance in my speech several days ago for every project.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not arguing either for or against this bill; but I want to know how they get at these figures.

Mr. FREAR. I understand.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Government of the United States can borrow all the money it wants at 3 per cent, and I believe the public debt of the United States can be refunded at 2 per cent or 1½ per cent, or even 1 per cent, if you will make the time long enough in the bond. Now, 3 per cent on $40,000, for instance, would be only $1,200 a year.

Mr. FREAR. That is one item.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How do they get the rest of that $4,000?

Mr. FREAR. The items have all been set forth. There is, next, janitor service——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They ought to cut out the janitor service.

Mr. FREAR. But they do not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We ought to put a provision in this bill that these small post-office buildings shall not have a janitor. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Then, in addition to that item, they figure depreciation, just the same as on any ordinary business proposition. Then comes the supplies, which I believe the chairman of the committee stated would be $800 or $900.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit, I do not want to take up his time, but I have studied about this thing a good deal. A small post office in a small town ought not to be allowed a janitor.

Mr. BURNETT. They do not have them in the rented post offices.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not think they have them in all the Government-owned buildings.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They do not have them in the towns where they rent post offices now?

Mr. LANGLEY. No.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It ought to be easier to keep a Government-owned building clean—that is, properly arranged for the business—than it is one of these rented stores.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to inquire of the Speaker whose duty would it be to keep a Government-owned building clean?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The postmaster's.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not a part of his duties.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why isn't it? It is a part of his duties now.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not included in his salary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not see why it should cost more to keep a Government-owned building clean than it does to keep one of these rented buildings clean.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think generally where they have rented quarters it is provided in the lease that the landlord shall keep the building clean.

MANY MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Where they have rented quarters, the Government employees keep the building clean. I wish the chairman of this committee, or somebody else, would put into this bill a provision that these small post-office buildings in small towns shall not have janitors.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We are going to offer an amendment to that effect before we get through.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You will perform a service to the country if you do.

Mr. FREAR. Here is a letter from the Treasury Department right in line with what the Speaker has suggested. It says:

> The department estimate for a building at a place of this size, and of similar postal receipts, for post-office purposes only, would probably be $25,000 for the building itself and $5,000 for the site. It is estimated that to furnish the building would require $3,000 additional, making a total outlay of $33,000.
> Calculating 3 per cent on this investment, the interest charge would be $990.

I submit, however, in that connection, that when we pay income taxes we are paying at the rate of 6 per cent, because money is worth that to the individual, and we are taxing the people of this country indirectly to-day at the rate of 6 per cent. That is what it means to the average man to help pay for these buildings, that is what his income tax pays for. The letter from the Treasury Department continues:

> The yearly depreciation of the building and furniture, together with the approximate cost of annual repairs, would amount to 2½ per cent on the amount invested in the project, exclusive of cost of site, viz: on $28,000, which would be $700.

Then it goes on and discusses about the different items. Now, let me make one more brief statement with regard to this. The distinguished Speaker of the House asked me a question. I want to say this, that I regretted very much the other day when I noticed in a paper a statement about an item in this bill which I think is probably better than many of the other items.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman has mentioned that, I should like to make one statement about it. I think that unnecessary buildings should be left off, and I hope there will be a fixed rule adopted with reference to public buildings, providing that when the postal receipts and other conditions reach a certain point, a town shall be entitled automatically to a public building. But one of the big papers, the New York Times, had an editorial on this subject, and in order to have a basis to say something about it, they doubled the amount, deliberately, as to building in my home town. It could not have been an accident. The proposed appropriation for the post office in my town is $40,000. That is all I asked for, and the committee gave it to me, but that paper stated in the middle of a long editorial that it was $80,000. That is the way they try to build up public opinion against these things.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that it was a clerical mistake. In one part of my speech it was correctly stated at $40,000. I did not know it referred to the Speaker's home town. At another place in my speech it appeared as $80,000. I was not aware of it. The Times stated its editorial was based upon figures taken from my speech of December 7. They seem to have taken the wrong figures, which resulted from a clerical error in one place that had been overlooked.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not know that they had ever quoted the gentleman's speech. They had an independent editorial into which they dragged me, and they said it was $80,000. Now, I will tell you about that, while I am at it. Conditions have changed there in six or seven years. And when the census was taken of that town the last time there was a gouge of 500 in population—accidentally or purposely—I do not know which. We offered to pay the expenses of the Government for retaking the census of that town, but they would not do it. It was that way all over the country. But it did one good thing; the apparent loss of population stirred the people of that town up so that they went to work and built four graveled roads in addition to the ones they had. There have been 200 houses built in that town since that census was taken. But these old figures give the census as it was taken. Now they are disposing of stock to build a sanitarium costing $250,000 in that town, and yet we are held to the figures of six or seven years ago.

If you take the new system of rural routes and improved roads by building gravel roads—and in addition to the three that we had we have built four more—it extends the service of that particular post office many miles by abolishing the small country crossroads post offices. So if you take the old figures and stick to them you are deceiving the public.

Another thing. The Census Office not long ago issued a statement as to the present population in cities. How did they do it? They took the growth of those cities from 1900 to 1910, just as if the growth of these cities and towns were an absolutely fixed quantity in the Census Office. Of course, there is no sort of common sense in it. One town may have 75 reasons for growing while another town of the same size has no reason at all.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we have towns that showed no postal receipts at all in 1905, and to-day they show postal receipts of $20,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The postal receipts in the town in which I live are growing at the rate of $1,000 a year. They now amount to nearly $11,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Ozark, Ala., $5,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 21, after line 19, insert: "United States post office at Palo Alto, Cal., $15,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Rich Hill, Mo., $5,000.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have no desire to take up the time of the House at this time, and I make this motion merely for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon this item and other items in the bill, and the bill generally.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. VARE. I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. VARE, ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, after line 13, insert: "United States post office at Roanoke, Ala., $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office and other Government offices at San Jose, Cal., $15,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 32, strike out lines 24 and 25.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of that I want to state that the committee just adopted an amendment on page 31 fixing a site at Palo Alto, and it was a mistake to insert San Jose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States post office at Sheffield, Ala., $5,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 33, after line 6, insert: "United States post office at Spencer, W. Va., $10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the provision in the public-building act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 888), for the enlargement, extension, remodeling, repairing, or improvement upon the present site and the enlarged site of the Federal building at Utica, N. Y., at a cost not exceeding $365,000, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the item of Oakland, Cal., page 14, so that the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] may offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to return to page 14. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, we want first to hear the amendment read.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to state before it is read that this amendment which the gentleman from California desires to offer will result in saving $50,000 to the Government. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 16 and 17 on page 14 and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to contract for the acquisition by purchase, condemnation or otherwise, of a new site and for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, mechanical equipment, and approaches complete, together with such mail-handling apparatus, etc., as he may deem advisable, for the use and accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices at Oakland, Cal., at a cost not exceeding $1,000,000.

"And that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon the completion and occupancy of said new building, to sell the present public building and the site thereof in Oakland, Cal., at such time, in such manner, and upon such terms as he may deem advisable; to convey such property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quitclaim deed; and to deposit the proceeds of said sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some explanation of this item before consent is given. This is no five or ten thousand dollar item, but is such an amount that would make a pretty big hole in the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to page 14?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am still reserving the right to object.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I am proposing this amendment in accordance with the recommendations of a letter addressed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, to the Speaker of the House, as contained in House Document 1776, second session, Sixty-fourth Congress. On his recent visit to California the Secretary of the Treasury inspected the post-office situation in Oakland. He examined the site there and decided that a new building there at a cost of $650,000 was inadvisable upon the present site, because of the size of the lot. He looked about and found that a site could be secured in the vicinity for an amount less than the amount the present site could be sold for. The present post-office building was erected about 20 years ago at a total combined cost for site and building of $250,000. The present site alone can be sold for $450,000, conservatively speaking, so that if this amendment is adopted the net result will be a saving to the Government of $50,000. As a matter of fact, if this amendment be adopted it will not only save the Government $50,000 but will afford a whole block as a post-office site, instead of only a portion of a block.

In this connection I insert herewith the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 16, 1915.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: The attention of Congress is respectfully invited to the Federal building at Oakland, Cal. The public-buildings act of March 4, 1913, authorized a much needed extension, remodeling, etc., of this building, and the acquisition of additional land necessary to accomplish this purpose.

In order to obtain the required land it became necessary to institute condemnation proceedings, and these resulted in an award of damages amounting to $51,750 more than the entire amount provided in the aforesaid act for both the extension work and the land. The act of March 3, 1915, provided this additional amount for a site, but having expended the entire sum authorized for land nothing remains for the work upon the building.

Bills (H. R. 10834 and S. 4276) are now pending in Congress providing for the construction of a new building at a limit of cost of $1,000,000.

The reports of this department submitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, under date of March 21, 1916, estimated that an adequate building could be constructed for $650,000, and the pending public-buildings bill (H. R. 17052) provides for the construction of a post office and customhouse at Oakland, Cal., at the limit estimated, i. e., $650,000.

Recent investigations at Oakland indicate that it would be to the advantage of the Government to dispose of the present site and building and secure a new site in a better location and at a less permanent investment than is involved with the present site.

Land in the immediate vicinity of the present location of the Federal building has materially increased in value, and it is believed that the present site could be sold for from $400,000 to $450,000 if prompt action could be taken in the matter. It is probable also that a new site occupying a whole square could be secured for about $270,000. The advantages of a site having four street frontages over the present one with two such frontages and an alley are manifest.

The present building is not adapted to enlargement or development along the best lines, and with an entire new site the Government would be able to construct a new building much better suited to provide for the present requirements of Oakland and for its future growth.

It is therefore recommended that existing legislation be amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to acquire a new site and erect thereon a new building at a limit of cost not exceeding $1,000,000, and upon the completion of the new building that the present site and building be disposed of.

A draft of the legislation necessary to accomplish the purposes indicated is transmitted herewith.

Respectfully, W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the public-buildings act, approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., 869), as authorized the enlargement, extension, remodeling, rebuilding, reconstruction, or improvement of the United States post office and customhouse at Oakland, Cal., be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to contract for the acquisition by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of a new site, and for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, mechanical equipment, and approaches, complete, together with such mail-handling apparatus, etc., as he may deem advisable, for the use and accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices at Oakland, Cal., at a cost of not exceeding $1,000,000.

"And that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon the completion and occupancy of said new building, to sell the present public building and the site thereof in Oakland, Cal., at such time, in such manner, and upon such terms as he may deem advisable; to convey such property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quitclaim deed; and to deposit the proceeds of said sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] has made out a good case. I have no objection to returning to the item at a later time in the consideration of the bill, but I wish to suggest that the phraseology contained in the amendment proposed is not the phraseology that the committee has adopted, so far as the sale of property is concerned. If the gentleman will temporarily withdraw his amendment, so that we can make a change to conform to the practice of the committee, I will have no objection, and I now ask unanimous consent that we may return to this item for that purpose.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the wording which I have adopted in my amendment is the exact wording suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But the committee has agreed on phraseology covering this class of cases. I ask unanimous consent that later on, when the amendment is perfected, we may return to this page for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to withdraw his request temporarily.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And permission also to later on return to this page.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell to the highest bidders at public or private sale, in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States, the United States warehouse site at San Juan, P. R., except so much of said property as he may deem advisable to retain for the use of any branch of the public service, to convey such property to the purchasers thereof by the usual quitclaim deeds, and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is this warehouse at San Juan right upon the harbor?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I rather think it is. I am not positive about that. The Treasury Department wants to sell it, because they have no use for it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that this section would leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to sell this property at public or private sale in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem to be to the best interest of the United States. That would permit him to sell it to any steamboat company which now has terminals there, would it not?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; it would permit him to sell it to any person, I suppose—to the highest bidder at public or private sale.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This matter of securing proper terminal facilities on water fronts like this is getting to be of the most serious importance; indeed, to some shippers it is, in their business, of vital importance. If the Secretary of the Treasury can sell that United States warehouse to a steamship company which already has a terminal down there, and upon any terms which he pleases, it may be that the sale will establish there a sort of monopoly of wharf privileges. We had something of this kind up once some years ago about a sale or proposed sale by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, of wharf property belonging to the Government and situated in Alaska. The House refused to permit it when an objection similar to that I am making was made in that case. I do not think that we ought to sell Goverenment wharf property except when absolutely necessary, and it will practically never be necessary. The city of New York has had to acquire private wharves and make them public at great expense. Other cities have had a similar experience.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct about that. The Government should not part with title to any property on a water front that may be used as a terminal, because the tendency now is to monopolize sites by private interests, which cuts out independent interests and competition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It enables one set of shippers if they get in with a vessel company, to coerce other shippers, to deprive them of fair facilities, to destroy equitable and just competition. As I said a moment ago, this matter of securing water-front terminals is getting to be a question not only of serious but, in a commercial sense, of vital importance to municipalities. No man ought to be permitted to sell—especially not at private sale—wharf frontage belonging to the Government of the United States to any private steamship company that he may chance to get an offer from. I ask that we pass this item until there is opportunity to look further into it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I have sent for the letter which the Secretary wrote to the Speaker. I ask unanimous consent that we pass over this item temporarily until we can get that information.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. With the privilege of returning to it later.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to pass over this item temporarily, with the privilege of returning to it later. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the first paragraph of section 11.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Are amendments to be offered at the end of the paragraph or after the section has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. After the paragraph.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will it be in order now to offer an amendment to this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, at the end of line 15, add the following: "Upon the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby empowered and directed to clear said squares."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TILSON. And that is whether this portion of the bill should not be read by sections. For instance, this section relating to the building for the Department of Justice, if read and amended by paragraph, might put us in the ridiculous position of being unable to go back to some previous part of the section which ought to be changed if some later portion of the section is changed. It seems to me it ought to be read by sections, otherwise it can not be intelligently amended.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the entire section be read, if the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do; and that is the reason I asked the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the section will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That a commission, consisting of the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, be, and is hereby, created, with full power and authority to obtain, through competition, under such conditions as the commission may prescribe, or from an architect specially selected by said commission, such designs, plans, estimates, specifications, etc., and such modifications therein as may be necessary, in connection with the construction of a suitable fireproof building, hereby authorized to be erected in the city of Washington, D. C., for the Department of Justice.

That payment for the architectural services hereinbefore authorized shall be made from the appropriation for the building for the Department of Justice, at such prices or rates of compensation as may be fixed by said commission, not in excess, however, of the customary and prevailing rates for similar services; and said commission is hereby authorized to enter into contract to such extent as it may deem necessary for such architectural services, or to delegate its authority to enter into such contract to the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as including the superintendence or local supervision of the work of constructing said building as a part of the architectural services hereinbefore authorized.

That the limit of cost of said Department of Justice Building, with fireproof vaults, elevators, equipment, and furnishings, ready for occupancy, and including compensation for architectural and other expert technical and clerical services, but exclusive of approaches and apparatus for generating electric current and heat, shall not exceed the sum of $3,000,000.

That said Department of Justice Building shall be located upon such portions of squares 226 and 227 immediately south of Pennsylvania Avenue between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets northwest as may be designated by the above-named commission.

That upon the approval of the designs, plans, and so forth, and the designation of the location as aforesaid, by said commission, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to enter into contracts for the construction, equipment, and furnishing of the said Department of Justice Building, and to employ such expert technical and clerical services as he may deem necessary and specially order in writing, to be employed exclusively in the Office of the Commissioner of Public Buildings in connection with the work on said building, all within the total limit of cost hereinbefore fixed: Provided, That the contracts for the furnishings for said building shall be made for only such articles as may be approved by the Attorney General.

That the adoption and approval of the design, plans, and so forth, for said Department of Justice Building by the above-named commission shall not prevent subsequent changes in the design, arrangement, materials, or methods of construction, or cost which may be found necessary or advantageous: Provided, That no changes shall be made involving an expense in excess of the limit of cost hereinbefore fixed.

That for the payment of architectural and other expert technical and clerical services and necessary expenses in obtaining designs, plans, estimates, specifications, and so forth, and for beginning the construction of said Department of Justice Building, the sum of $500,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as in any wise interfering with or violating any agreement heretofore made by the Treasury Department with any architect or architects with relation to the drafting of plans for a Department of Justice Building, but any such agreement, if it exists, shall in good faith be carried out.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I now offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, at the end of line 15, add the following: "upon the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby empowered and directed to clear said squares."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the chairman of the committee accepts the amendment. This amendment simply asks that the special commission to be appointed under the bill shall take the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts. I think it is to be regretted that the Commission of Fine Arts bears that name, because in the minds of some people the name conveys the idea that the commission are given to things not worth while, that they run to the purely ornamental. But this impression is altogether a wrong one. The commission has already rendered the Government, especially by its work for the city of Washington, services of inestimable value. Its members are among the most eminent, if, indeed, they themselves are not the most eminent, men in their respective professions in America to-day. They serve without personal compensation of any kind, being reimbursed only for their official traveling expenses, and then only in part for those. They give many days of their time and experience to the Government throughout the year freely and without stint, mainly because of patriotic pride in the best development of the National Capital and Government art in general. Their services have resulted in a direct saving of large sums of money to the United States, as, for instance, where experts formerly had to be employed and paid to give decisions in such matters as now come before the Fine Arts body officially, and the further economy in seeing that the United States through funds appropriated by the Committees on Appropriation of Congress gets absolutely the best possible artistic results for its money. All their efforts are in the direction of simplicity and dignity and against expenditures of public funds for unnecessary elaboration and adornment in public buildings, monuments, and other pieces of sculpture, paintings, and the like.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. BARNHART. Who constitutes this Commission of Fine Arts and who appoints them?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The President.

Mr. BARNHART. How many members is it composed of?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not know just how many are architects. One member is a famous landscape artist, Mr. Frederick Law Olmsted. At one time Mr. McKim, of McKim, Mead & White, of New York, and Mr. Daniel Burnham, of Chicago, two of the very foremost architects in the United States, and Mr. Augustus St. Gaudens, one of the most eminent sculptors in the world, were members of the commission, and gave their services to the Government.

Mr. BARNHART. Does the gentleman think that a commission of that sort ought to have charge of the jurisdiction over the construction of an ordinary business building, like the post-office building or a court building, all over the country?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This amendment has nothing to do with post-office buildings or courthouses. It relates only to the national Department of Justice Building in the city of Washington, to be at the head of Pennsylvania Avenue, diagonally across from the Treasury, in almost, if not quite, the most conspicuous site in the city.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. My impression was that site was reserved for a building to be erected to house the Department of State.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the two just reversed. The Department of State, according to the plans, was to be housed on the square just at the Mall; I will ask the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. I can not say.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; it was. The plan provides also that the Department of Justice Building shall be practically on a line with the District of Columbia Building as this now stands. And between the Department of Justice Building, on the Avenue, and that of the Department of State, on the Mall, is to be a building for another of the departments.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will yield.

Mr. BORLAND. I did not understand the portion of the gentleman's amendment which says the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the site cleared. Why is that necessary?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. You can not erect a building where those other structures stand until these have been removed.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand that; but the Government owns the ground now and they have a right to have the site cleared when they get ready to build a building.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Government owns the property, but the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority to tear down the buildings on it unless Congress shall authorize him to do so. The ownership and control are in the Government, not in the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BORLAND. The Government designates certain officers for the construction of a new building on an old site, and part of it would be preparing the site for the construction of the building. I do not see where the gentleman separates the two.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall just how the first part of his amendment reads? Upon the advice of the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; upon the advice of the commission.

Mr. MANN. That is offered as an amendment to a paragraph fixing the site of the building. I suppose the gentleman wants to put in a requirement that the plans for the building shall meet the approval of the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The language of this paragraph is:

That said Department of Justice building shall be located upon such portions of squares 226 and 227 immediately south of Pennsylvania Avenue between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets NW. as may be designated by the above-named commission.

But all they would have to do under the language would be to advise the commission to locate the Department of Justice building on a portion of these two squares.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Illinois is correct, as usual, in his observation and comment; but I drew that in that way for this reason: I was much surprised to learn that it had been proposed to locate this Department of Justice building toward Pennsylvania Avenue, quite a number of feet beyond the line of the District of Columbia Building.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I know that expert architects and city planners think that so to locate the building would be a mistake and detract much from appearances there.

Mr. MANN. That may be; but, of course, under the orders of the President, as I understand, all of these things had to be passed upon by the Fine Arts Commission, anyhow. I supposed the gentleman was seeking to put in a positive requirement that would govern on the theory that the commission might not follow the existing Executive order, and I wondered whether this would do it or not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Illinois, when I remind him, will remember that the Executive order made by President Wilson shortly after he came into the office modified and took away the mandatory provision of the Executive order of President Taft, and reads in effect that when the building to be constructed will materially affect the architectural appearance of the city then they shall consult the commission, thus leaving it entirely optional with them.

Mr. MANN. It leaves it optional to accept the plan?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; to take the advice.

Mr. MANN. Maybe the gentleman is right.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman will recollect a similar question came up about the location of those buildings down on the water front. The Fine Arts Commission was not consulted about them.

Mr. MANN. Congress located those buildings.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Nor was the opinion of the Fine Arts Commission requested in regard to the new Interior building. But nevertheless the commission vigorously insisted that it ought not to be of red brick. At last their advice as to material for the exterior was heeded. But as first planned that mammoth structure was to be of red brick, and to loom up like a great red factory.

Mr. MANN. It may be that the amendment will cover. I have no suggestion to offer as to how it ought to be, because I have not canvassed it as the gentleman has. I was thinking they are supposed to consult the Fine Arts Commission anyhow. If they do not do it, and you want to make them do it, you ought to fix it so that they will have to do it. It may be that the language will do that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I hold in my hand another amendment to put in after the word "commission" in line 18—"upon the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts."

Mr. MANN. I think that will cover it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield to me? This paragraph provides that the Department of Justice Building shall be located on such portions of squares 226 and 227 immediately south of Pennsylvania Avenue, and so forth. Now, the gentleman states that it is the intention to place that building substantially on a line with the District Municipal Building. As I remember, that would place the north front of the building south of E Street, leaving out of account the entire triangle bounded by E Street, the Avenue, and Fifteenth Street.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The plan of the city of Washington contemplates that that shall be a little park, and that at the head of the Avenue and on the opposite side of the park as you come around from the Treasury Department, shall be the dignified and beautiful front of the building of the Department of Justice.

Mr. TILSON. There will be nothing on that triangle at all?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the design of the original plan, and that is the one that was approved later.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: On page 38, line 17, after the word "forth," insert the words "upon the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts," and, on the same page, line 18, after the word "commission," insert the words "upon the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have no objection to that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of directing an inquiry to the gentleman in charge of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. In a prior public-building act we authorized the construction of a building for the Department of State. The plans, I believe, were drawn and the site chosen on which to erect the building. Can the gentleman inform the committee what is the status of that proposition, and the reason why we are not going ahead with that work?

Here we are authorizing the construction of a new building, and yet for several years this authorization has been carried for the building for the Department of State, and there is nothing developed further than the plans.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I will state that originally that property was purchased for the purpose of erecting thereon three departmental buildings—one for the Department of Justice, one for the Department of State, and one for the Department of Commerce and Labor. Since that time the Department of Commerce and Labor has been divided into two separate departments. The plans were drawn, but I understand they were drawn with reference to the construction of those three departmental buildings.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the plans, they were drawn separately, and a separate plan was drawn for the erection of a building to be used by the Department of State.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand that. But I was going on to state that there was one plan drawn for the Department of Commerce and Labor, and, of course, their having been divided makes it necessary to have a plan for a separate building for each. The Department of State, as I understand it, is really not so much pressed for room as is the Department of Justice. That is in the worst condition of any of them. It was thought that at this particular time the building for the Department of Justice is the only one we could carry in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I will have to take issue with that statement, because of the two departments, the Department of Justice and the Department of State, the Department of State needs housing now more than does the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice has only recently—this very month—moved into a privately erected building, which will accommodate it and its activities for years to come.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whereas the Department of State is housed now, I believe, in three separate buildings.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; but the gentleman must understand that we are paying an enormous rent for this Department of Justice Building, whereas the Department of State is occupying a building owned by the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is just the opposite.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Some of the branches of the Department of State are on the outside.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is just the opposite. The rental of the Department of Justice is one of the most reasonable that the Government has ever secured for a private office building. The rental is at the rate of 33.3 cents per square foot of available space, not including, it is true, the heat and upkeep. But that is one of the best rentals that has ever been secured by the Government. So far as the Department of State is concerned, it is obliged to go into ill-arranged buildings, paying a much higher rental.

I wish to direct this inquiry to the gentleman: Have we not authorized a building for the Department of State?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All three were authorized at a cost aggregating $8,000,000 some years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this supplementary to that authorization?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; it is not. This is a separation from the $8,000,000, or a segregating of $3,000,000 for the building for the Department of State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. This subject, Mr. Chairman, has been called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations from time to time, and only this year the committee had under consideration the new quarters arranged for the accommodation of the Department of Justice. They have not only an available space in this new building to accommodate their activities at present for all their agencies of work, but additional space to permit of the enlargement of those activities, whereas the Department of State is distributed in two or three private buildings, and only this year, and last year also, it appealed to the committee for authorization to enter into a contract with private parties for the rental of a building that would house all of its activities. From my knowledge of the activities of those departments, I think the Department of State, by reason of its activities—the Mexican situation and other national affairs and the work arising out of the European war—there is much more pressing need to house in a Government building the Department of State, where they need large quarters for the reception of diplomats, than a mere office building for the Department of Justice, which will meet its needs for years to come.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, on the 10th of last June the House passed a Senate bill providing for the appointment of a commission to locate a site for a public archives building. What is the status of that now?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not think there has been any selection, or any report made, at any rate. I want to say to the gentleman that I am very much in favor of it, and I think the entire committee recognizes the absolute necessity for such a building.

Mr. FESS. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And I think we will bring in later on a separate bill covering that matter, which is very urgent.

Mr. FESS. Was anything of that sort brought to the attention of the committee?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, this discussion gives a very good illustration of the absence of economy, pure and simple, touching the building of public buildings, even of the large type. By that I do not mean to say that I think we ought not to build public buildings here for the housing of the great departments, but I do want to call attention to the fact that the usual argument made, particularly by local people desirous of a great building program, will not stand analysis.

It is proposed to appropriate $3,000,000 for this building. Figuring the interest on $3,000,000, you will have an interest cost on your investment that represents nearly three times what it is now costing to rent a modern building for the Department of Justice. We are going to pay about $36,000 rent to house the Department of Justice in the new quarters that they have just moved into, whereas we are proposing to expend $3,000,000 for a building for that department, the interest on which, I say, would amount to nearly three times that sum. Now, I simply call attention to that as a very pat illustration of the fact that you never get economy out of constructing monumental types of buildings for the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land for the use of the United States penitentiary on McNeil Island, in the State of Washington, at a limit of cost not to exceed the sum of $10,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 40, strike out lines 1 to 6, inclusive.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to determine upon what theory this particular provision was incorporated in a bill to provide for the acquisition of sites for public buildings and for the erection of public buildings on sites already acquired.

This provision is to acquire additional land for the Federal penitentiary at McNeil Island, Wash. The recommendation has twice been made to the Committee on Appropriations for this authority, and has twice been refused because of the absolute worthlessness of the request.

At McNeil Island, Wash., there is a Federal penitentiary. It consists of 87 acres of land. The total value of the land and buildings, according to an appraisement filed with the Committee on Appropriations within two years, is $143,000. The average convict population of the penitentiary is 200, and the total number of persons upon McNeil Island, an island about 4 miles long and 2½ miles wide, containing 4,300 acres, including prisoners and the officials of the penitentiary, is, according to the reports of the Department of Justice, not to exceed 500 persons. So that for an institution which now has 87 acres of land for 200 inmates it is proposed to spend $10,000 to acquire no one knows how much land, and no one knows what particular land. This statement is based upon the statements of the officials of the Department of Justice made before the Committee on Appropriations.

On the 23d day of January, 1915, Mr. McGlasson, who is the assistant in charge of the Federal prison, was asked—

The CHAIRMAN. How many acres of ground do you contemplate purchasing?

Mr. MCGLASSON. We have not decided on any precise number of acres. The warden says that the cost will be from $150 to $250 an acre.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a map showing what is contemplated?

Mr. MCGLASSON. We have not picked out any particular land. We hope to buy some land adjoining the present reservation.

They do not know how much land they need. They do not know what land they desire. They do not know in what particular place the land is located, but they wish some additional land.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. When I have completed my statement I shall yield. It was suggested that it was desired to get some additional land for the purpose of improving the water supply. Of course, if anyone desired land for the purpose of improving the water supply of an institution, there would be definite information as to what particular land was desired, the area of land that would be required for that purpose, and its character. But the report of the Attorney General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, just six months ago, discloses that that excuse is not now available. On page 432 of the report, in the part about McNeil Island, is a statement about the farm. There is a well, No. 1, and at that well a pump was installed early in the year, and during the dry summer months it has been in operation an average of eight hours a day, lifting 3,000 gallons of water per hour. The report states:

The water supply in this well is practically inexhaustible, a test of 48 hours' continuous pumping lowering the water less than an inch.

Drilling at deep well No. 2 has progressed under difficulties. Five hundred feet is the limit that the drilling machine in use at this well is guaranteed to work. The drill in this well, however, has been forced down to a depth of 700 feet, and the water now stands in the pipe about 18 inches above the ground level.

It is probably not advisable to attempt to go deeper in this well with the equipment available, although there is a strong probability that flowing water would be secured if a sufficient depth were attainable. Under the circumstances the installation of an air-lift pump is contemplated, after which the water supply of the institution will be more than doubled and should be amply sufficient for all purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

Mr. DYER. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. So that when this pump is installed there will be ample water supply and the excuse that the land is needed for the purpose of increasing the water supply is obviated.

It was stated before the Committee on Appropriations by the superintendent of Federal prisons that it would be advisable to abandon this prison and to send all of the Federal prisoners to Atlanta and to Leavenworth, where we have modern, well-equipped prisons. When the State of Washington was admitted to the Union it was provided that this Federal prison, which was established in 1867, should be turned over to the State of Washington. The Federal Government offered the prison and its equipment to the State, and the governor declined to accept it until the legislature would make provision for its maintenance, and the legislature has consistently refused ever since to take the prison over.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Including the prisoners.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would be used as a State institution. Here is an island of about 4,300 acres of land, upon which there are 200 convicts. A little over 100 or 200 persons outside of the prison inmates and officials live on the island. What peculiar value land will have in such a location it is difficult to imagine. Who would wish to establish a summer home, or engage in some commercial enterprise, upon an island where there is an unfenced Federal prison? Yet some one has some land that he is preparing to unload on the Federal Government at a cost of from $150 to $250 an acre.

I spent three years in a boarding school in which there were 300 pupils on 100 acres of land. I know that 87 acres of land is more than ample for every possible use that is proper for an institution of 200 persons. This item, Mr. Chairman, can not be justified on the ground that it is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, that it has anything to do with public buildings, that it is for any public use or for any public purpose. It ought to be excluded from this bill. While I differ as to the propriety of some items in this bill, I have refrained from discussing them.

I can appreciate that there can be an honest difference of opinion about many items in the bill. But here is an item that has no legitimate excuse for continuing in the bill. It does not accomplish anything. It would be in order before this session adjourns to offer as an amendment to the sundry civil bill a proposition to acquire adjacent land to the McNeil penitentiary, because an amendment to acquire land adjacent to an existing institution is in order on the sundry civil bill. If this proposition has merit it could be justified, and instead of having merely an authorization which this bill gives without any money, the money would be forthcoming at once. The item can not be justified and ought in the interest of common legislative decency to be excluded from the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion to strike this item from the bill, although I desire to say frankly that I do not favor the passage of a public-buildings bill at this time. I hope that the paragraph calling for $10,000 with which to add territory to the site of a Federal penitentiary located on McNeil Island in the State of Washington will not be sufficient to accuse myself and my colleagues with attempted pork-grabbing.

Here is an item that has been everybody's business and nobody's business for years. Nothing can be gained by singling out this as the one item to strike from this bill. A Federal grand jury, as a result of full investigation, issued a report some years ago, asking that steps be taken for the purchase of this land. I introduced a bill to purchase probably 100 acres—additional land—for not to exceed $10,000, and because the bill was referred by the Speaker to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the item has come forth in this bill.

The necessity for the additional land is, first, to secure a water supply for the Federal penitentiary that was located there, as the gentleman from New York said, before the State became a State, and, second, for the purpose of providing additional land to be farmed by the prisoners, the present site being 87 acres, not all tillable. Lands in one end of the island will be purchased of these homesteaders who settled there before the days of the penitentiary, so as to make this end of the island a penitentiary site somewhat similar to that of Blackwells Island.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But there are 15,000 acres in the island and the Government only has 87.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There are more than 200 prisoners there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Attorney General says that last year there were 226.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Two hundred and thirty-six. The number at the time of the last report was 239, and they received 2 more, making 241, and 5 are discharged, leaving a population of 236. These prisoners come from Alaska, California, Montana, Idaho, and the State of Washington. Indian offenders are frequently sent there.

It would not be in the line of either Federal efficiency or Federal economy to transport prisoners from Alaska to Atlanta, Ga. This penitentiary is considered a modern penitentiary. The prisoners indulge in agriculture; they use this land; they need more. At times there have been outbreaks and 15 or 20 prisoners have escaped, and, overrunning the island, have terrorized the inhabitants.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that the addition of 100 acres to what they now have would change the situation as to prisoners overrunning the island?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, let them overrun it if there is no one else there.

Mr. SHERLEY. What the gentleman is planning for is to buy everybody's land on that island and unload the ownership upon the Federal Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am offering this at the suggestion of the Federal grand jury.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, the Federal grand jury out there is glad to have Uncle Sam spend his money there; but what reason is there for expending good money on that island except for the men who live on the island, who own the land and want to get rid of it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We want to get them off of one end of the island and pay them a nominal sum for their holdings.

Mr. SHERLEY. But there is no obligation on the part of the Government to pay them and get them off of the island, where they voluntarily went.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But they went there before the penitentiary was established.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why not be frank and say that this is a bill to recompense homesteaders who went upon this island, where a penitentiary has since been established?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have made a statement with regard to that. A complete report and statement from the grand jury was filed by me in the office of the chairman of this committee and with the Department of Justice. The department has, I believe, made numerous attempts to secure an appropriation for the purchase of additional land.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The gentleman from New York seems to be somewhat out of humor because the people of the State of Washington do not want to take over this penitentiary. We do not want it. It is not maintained for the people of Washington; it is for Federal prisoners.

I will tell the gentleman what the purpose of this appropriation of $10,000 is. I did not introduce the bill, it is not in my district, and I do not care personally anything about it. I wish they would remove this prison, take it out of the State. The Government ought to keep that prison so that it is in proper shape to keep prisoners or they ought to abolish it. Here is the condition at this time. I will read a letter from the Department of Justice which throws some light on the proposition. It is not for the purpose of purchasing the homesteads from the people who live there. This letter says:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1916.

HON. FRANK CLARK,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: The department acknowledges the receipt of your letter of the 13th instant requesting a report on bill H. R. 4776, making an appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase of additional land for the United States penitentiary, McNeil Island, Wash.

Under the act of Congress approved January 22, 1867, provision was made for the erection of a United States penitentiary in Washington Territory, the amount to be expended for this purpose being limited to $20,000. The act approved February 22, 1873, authorized an increased sum of $20,000, and in 1874 an additional appropriation of about $7,000 was made to place the buildings in a suitable condition for the reception and confinement of convicts.

After the approval of the act of February 22, 1889 (25 Stat., 680), providing for the admission of Washington Territory into the Union as a State, the attention of Federal officials therein was called in 1890 to section 15 of said act, which the department seemed to hold provided for the transfer of the United States penitentiary on McNeil Island to the State of Washington. Instructions to this effect were given the then United States marshal, district of Washington, but the governor of the State declined to accept the institution, with the prisoners therein, until specific authority for its acceptance had been conferred on him by the Legislature of Washington. This was never done, and the United States marshal was accordingly directed by the Attorney General to continue to conduct the penitentiary as before, and it has since been, and is now, conducted as a Federal institution.

In the estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 the department had an item of $10,000 for the purchase of additional land for the McNeil Island institution, but the appropriation was not made by Congress and the item therefore was not again included in the estimates for 1917.

The penitentiary reservation now contains 87 acres, which is divided as follows:

Penitentiary reservation.	Acres.
Prison-yard inclosure	12½
Beach, roads, and slough	22
Meadow and pasturage	32½
Garden truck	7
Potatoes	6
Orchard	5
Strawberries	1
Blackberries	½
Raspberries	½
Total	87

Land in the vicinity of the reservation is held at $150 to $250 per acre.

This penitentiary is located on an island in Puget Sound, some 3 miles in the nearest direction from the mainland. The island contains something like 50 or 60 square miles. There are a few farmers and fishermen on the island. The penitentiary water supply is obtained by piping water from springs to cement storage tanks. The supply is inadequate, and in case of fire the tanks would soon be exhausted—in fact, on bathing days the tanks are almost empty. Experimental wells have been sunk in an endeavor to get more water. The warden says he is opposed to the erection of any more prison buildings or the doing of any more work to improve or enlarge the penitentiary until the water question has been exhausted.

The estimate of $10,000 made in the estimates for 1916 was for the purchase of additional land having springs or other water supply and upon which to raise supplies for the prison and to give increased fodder production and pasturage for milch cows.

The institution now has accommodations for a maximum of 225 prisoners, and the population is about up to the maximum. It has been necessary to divert Federal prisoners from districts along the Pacific coast to State prisons to prevent overcrowding the McNeil Island institution. The number of prisoners received each year from Alaska and Pacific Coast States is increasing and another cell wing should be erected at the McNeil Island institution to take care of this increase and to avoid sending prisoners to State prisons, where they must be boarded by the Government. However, it would not be advisable to build this new wing until additional land is obtained for water supply, pasturage, and other purposes.

Respectfully,
For the Attorney General:

SAM. J. GRAHAM,
Assistant Attorney General.

Now, think of keeping 230 prisoners there in a prison where they have not sufficient water supply, and which on bathing days is exhausted.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I do not yield at this time—and when in case of fire they would have no protection. It seems to be the idea of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who is a great economist—and I admire him for it, and I very often follow what he says—that it would be economy to keep that penitentiary in such shape that it is not habitable for these prisoners that come from Alaska, Washington, and Montana, and to pay transportation to take them to these other penitentiaries throughout the country. This letter says that the number of prisoners received from Alaska and the Pacific coast is still increasing and that another wing should be erected to provide for the increase.

I think you can begin to see some of the reasons why it is necessary to have this $10,000. In the first place, it is to maintain at that prison sufficient water supply for convenience and safety, and in the next place, to save the expense of sending the prisoners to other prisons in the interior, which would cost a great deal more than it would to take them to this prison.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I got a little confused about this situation. I understood the other gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] to say something that indicated a purpose on the part of the proponents of this measure or some one else to have the Government acquire title to all of the land upon that island.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I never heard anything about that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. About 15,000 acres, worth from one hundred to two hundred dollars per acre.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I think I was misunderstood, or, perhaps, I made a statement which was not quite clear. The report of the grand jury says that it is desired to buy about 100 additional acres.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Ten thousand dollars would not buy that island. A considerable portion of it, I think, is very fine land; but evidently the purpose of this $10,000 is to purchase some of the springs on the hillside so that they can have this water by gravity system instead of by well. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations ought to refuse any further appropriation for this prison and abandon it, or we ought to make this small appropriation and secure these springs and have the water supply where these prisoners can be properly kept.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state where there are any springs? I tried to find out where there was any supply. Nobody in the Department of Justice knew anything about it, and apparently nobody on this floor from the State of Washington has any further information.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, the gentleman has assumed in advance that we do not know anything more about it than he does.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the Department of Justice had shown a necessity to acquire land to increase the water supply there would have been no trouble in getting it, but the Department of Justice knew nothing about it. They simply wanted the $10,000 to purchase somebody's land, and did not know where it was located, what was in it, or what was on it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would presume, if this $10,000 were given to the Department of Justice, that they would not be so idiotic as to go out and purchase land that had no water on it. There is no doubt that there are springs in that vicinity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 27, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the following-described public buildings and grounds at Sitka, Alaska, are granted to the Territory of Alaska, to be used by the said Territory as a home for aged, sick, and infirm pioneers and residents thereof, at the expense of the Territory, to wit:

The barracks tract, beginning at a point on the north side of Lincoln Street 212.5 feet from an old cannon set in the ground at the intersection of said Lincoln Street with the beach line; thence north 54° 30′ east 122 feet, thence north 37° 30′ west 220 feet, thence north 48° east 40 feet, thence north 33° 30′ east 17 feet, thence north 30° 30′ west 86 feet, thence south 56° 30′ west 163 feet, thence south 36° east 56.2 feet, thence south 52° 30′ west 78.4 feet, and from thence south 49° 30′ east 277.8 feet to the place of beginning, with the buildings thereon.

The naval hospital tract, beginning at a point 40 feet from the northwest corner of the barracks tract and in the line which forms the northern boundary of the parade ground, from thence north 47° west 160 feet, thence south 79° west 17.8 feet, thence south 11° west 98.5, thence south 50° 30′ east 108 feet, and from thence north 52° 30′ east 82 feet to the place of beginning, with the buildings thereon.

The parade-ground tract, beginning at a point marked by an old cannon embedded vertically in the ground at the intersection of Lincoln Street with the beach line, thence north 54° 30′ east 212.5 feet, thence north 49° 30′ west 277.8 feet, thence south 52° 30′ west 120.5 feet, thence south 50° 30′ east 28 feet, thence south 52° 30′ west 51 feet to the beach line, and from thence 228 feet along the beach line to the place of beginning, with the buildings thereon.

The tide flat between high and low water in front of the parade-ground tract, on which is situated a boat landing belonging to the above-described premises, with the buildings thereon.

All line courses in the foregoing descriptions are given in geographical directions.

That the Territory of Alaska shall never sell or otherwise dispose of any part of said property, and if the same shall ever be abandoned for the uses herein declared the said premises shall revert to the United States.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Hon. S. R. Blanton, of Owensboro, Ky., is at the Capital for the purpose of delivering to the President and Members of Congress certain resolutions adopted by the American Society of Equity. Mr. Blanton is general organizer for the society and holds credentials from Mr. H. G. Tank, of Wausau, Wis., the national secretary and treasurer of the organization.

The American Society of Equity is a powerful farmers' organization. It was organized 14 years ago. It has a membership of over half a million distributed over 15 States. It has done much for the farmers. In the Northwest its most important work has been in organizing local grain elevators and a large terminal elevator at St. Paul. At almost every station in my State there is a local grain elevator cooperatively owned by equity members. Finding it necessary to follow their grain to the terminals the American Society of Equity, through a subsidiary corporation, the Equity Cooperative Exchange, built a great terminal elevator at St. Paul, which is now in successful operation. To do this required a great amount of agitation and the cooperation of a large number of farmers scattered over the farms in Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana, who showed their faith in the enterprise by investing their money in it. While others have talked and dreamed about cooperative marketing, the equity men have been organizing successfully to market their products. The marketing of grain is only one of their activities, and is mentioned only to show the helpful and large way the society tackles farm problems. Among the men directing the affairs of the society and responsible for its great growth and success are D. O. Mahoney, president, Viroqua, Wis.; H. G. Tank, secretary and treasurer, Wausau, Wis.; M. F. Sharp, national organizer, St. Paul, Minn.; John M. Anderson, president Equity Cooperative Exchange, St. Paul; J. G. Crites, general manager; G. A. Thiel, treasurer; F. E. Osborn, convention manager; A. M. Baker, editor Cooperators Herald; M. P. Johnson, president of the North Dakota division; and Magnus Johnson, holding a similar position in Minnesota.

The annual convention of the society was held last month. Important resolutions were adopted. Ordinarily such resolutions are trusted to the mails, and sometimes the passing of resolutions is a perfunctory thing of little meaning. Not so with the American Society of Equity. They directed that one of their number should personally carry their resolutions to Washington. In pursuance of this the national secretary, Mr. H. G. Tank, wrote a letter of introduction for Mr. S. R. Blanton, who is here now to perform the task assigned to him by his society. It will lighten his burden to have the resolutions printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; it will be a convenience to those of you who have not already read the resolutions to find them in to-morrow morning's RECORD. Mr. Blanton advises me that they were passed without a dissenting vote. I ask permission to have the resolutions printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the fourteenth annual convention, American Society of Equity, December 12–15, 1916.

Whereas since the passage of the Smith-Lever Act we have a system in the State and Nation whereby experts are furnished to counties desiring them to assist farmers in their agricultural problems. We heartily indorse this movement, provided the system is not abused and made the instrument of those who are dubious of or unfriendly to our plans for better business organization, cooperative marketing, and rural credit reform. We are opposed to the county agent plan when boards of trade, advancement associations, or other groups of men whose interests are not in accord with ours seek to control the county representative and prevent him from assisting farmers who need help in organization of those cooperative marketing associations familiar to us all.

Therefore we recommend that our national secretary be instructed to cooperate with our State union secretary, to the end that full information relative to the work which the county agents are doing in the several States be secured, and submit the result of this investigation to our membership through the medium of our National and State papers.

We earnestly urge upon Congress the imperative need of a prompt and thorough investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, assisted by the Department of Agriculture, of the marketing of live stock and the meat-packing industries in this and other countries. We urge that this investigation be followed by a report, with constructive recommendations for the improvement of the conditions and methods under which live stock is marketed and the products thereof manufactured, distributed, and sold.

We urge upon Congress the making of an adequate appropriation and the giving of adequate authority to the Federal Trade Commission to enable it to cover all important phases of the problem, including the experiences of other countries with municipal abattoirs and cooperatively owned packing plants, all to the end that a free and uncontrolled market may be assured, that any existing abuses may be corrected, that present wastes may be eliminated, and that new methods may be adopted. We further urge that the fullest publicity be given to all facts affecting the prices of live stock received by the producer and the cost of meat products paid by the consumer.

Whereas certain groups of big business have seized upon the opportunity offered by the European war to foist upon the people of this Republic a military force that will, if not checked, surpass the militarism of any country on the habitable globe; and

Whereas militarism is directly contrary to the spirit of our institutions and hostile to a republican form of government and perilous to the liberties of the common people; and

Whereas in order to establish this un-American, undemocratic, and unnecessary military burden upon the people, as a first essential in that direction, Congress passed what is known as the Hay-Chamberlain Army reorganization bill, which makes a soldier of every able-bodied male citizen of the United States and gives power to the President to draft them into military service; and

Whereas the agricultural and industrial workers make up the greatest part of the military serviceable citizenship, so that when they are drafted into the military service our productive agricultural and industrial activities will be interrupted and society's welfare thereby injured; and

Whereas it is the common people who, in case of war, are the trench diggers and food for the cannons' mouths, driven to the slaughter, while those who profit by war get not near the firing line; and

Whereas the expenditures for military purposes in this country have become unreasonable, unbearable, the expenditures for 1916 being $873,000,000 and the estimates for 1917 being $300,694,684, the grand total for the two years reaching the colossal sum of $1,173,694,684, a sum twice as large as was ever appropriated by any Government in any country within the same time in times of peace: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Society of Equity in national convention assembled on this 12th day of December, 1916, That we demand of the Congress of the United States the immediate repeal of the un-American measure known as the Hay-Chamberlain Army reorganization bill; and

Resolved further, That a committee of one be appointed by this body to wait on the President of the United States and upon the Members of Congress with copies of this resolution; also that the national secretary be requested to have printed 600 copies of this resolution for this purpose.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Florida a question. I do not know whether the gentleman has stated it or not, but I should like to know how much the totals of this bill are increased by the various committee amendments that have been adopted.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have not the figures, but it is very slight.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Several hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, no. The gentleman means by amendments that have been offered and adopted since the bill has been under consideration in the House?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; amendments by the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, I should not think over $200,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I caught four or five of them which amounted to something like twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars, and I thought the total might have run up to a considerable amount.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I think not; but I can have the figures for the gentleman in a short time.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That it shall be the duty of the custodians of all public buildings of the United States of America and all buildings in which is located a post office of the United States to raise over such building the flag of the United States of America on each secular day when weather conditions are favorable. It shall be the duty of any department of the Government under which division said buildings or post offices are controlled to provide for any such building a suitable flag for the purposes herein provided.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I suppose the gentleman desires to insert a speech about standing by the flag and the appropriations?

Mr. LANGLEY. It was at my suggestion, as a member of the committee, that this section was incorporated in the bill, and I want to explain my purpose in doing that, but I do not want to take the time to do it now.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that it is my purpose to ask before we get through that all gentlemen have the right to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon this bill, whether they have spoken or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That so much of section 4 of the public-building act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 873), as authorizes the acquisition of a site and the erection of a suitable building thereon for the United States customhouse at Nogales, Ariz., at a cost not exceeding $110,000, and so much of section 5 of said act (37 Stats., p. 877) as authorizes the acquisition of a site for the United States post office and other governmental offices at Nogales, Ariz., at a cost not exceeding $10,000, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, one site and to erect thereon one building for the of such sale into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt. accommodation of the United States post office, customhouse, and other governmental offices in Nogales, Ariz., at a cost not exceeding $120,000, of which limit of cost not exceeding $15,000 shall be expended for such site; and that the appropriation of $16,000 made by the act of Congress approved July 29, 1914 (38 Stats., p. 563), in pursuance of said authorization of March 4, 1913, for a site and building for said customhouse, be, and the same is hereby, made available for the acquisition of the site and the commencement of the erection of the building hereinbefore authorized for said post office and customhouse.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a committee amendment there, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, amend by striking out all of line 26.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States courthouse and other branches of the Government service at Dallas, Tex., upon the site acquired for that purpose, $1,250,000. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell at public sale, after due advertisement once a week for four successive weeks in some newspaper published in Dallas, Tex., the present Federal building at Dallas and the site upon which the same is located for not less than $1,000,000, the proceeds of the said sale to be paid into the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt: Provided, That the Government is to occupy and use the same until the new Federal building herein provided for shall have been completed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. This portion of the bill which contains substantive propositions under sections—are we considering the bill by sections or paragraphs?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We are considering this portion of the bill by sections when it is all one item.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. This amendment is similar to the amendment that has heretofore been agreed upon as to the terms of sale for these various public-building sites and buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 23, strike out lines 23 and 24 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "by private sale, but at not less than the value as determined by an appraisal thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States, the."

And strike out, on page 45, line 1, the words "for not less than $1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and convey such land and building by the usual quitclaim deed to the purchaser thereof."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That will leave——

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the form heretofore adopted by the committee.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If I followed the amendment, it struck out all of lines 23 and 24. I believe it should not strike out the word "the," in line 24, the last word in line 24.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think I have the word "the" included in the amendment. It may be that the Clerk did not report it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Very well.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was very careful in drafting the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that later we may return to this item for the purpose of making a brief statement in regard to it, providing we get along with the bill sufficiently fast for me to make that statement before adjournment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. United States post office, courthouse, and other Government offices at Rock Hill, S. C., $125,000. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell the present building and site, at public or private sale, and turn the proceeds of said sale into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt. If the Secretary of the Treasury finds that it is more feasible to buy additional land for a site for the Federal courthouse adjacent to or near the present post-office building, he is hereby authorized to acquire such additional land, by purchase or condemnation, and to erect a courthouse on the same, and in that event the sum of $100,000 is hereby authorized for the acquisition of said additional land and the erection of a courthouse on the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. This amendment is similar in purport to the one just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 45, line 10, insert, after the word "sale," the following: "but at not less than the value as determined by an appraisal thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States, and convey said land and building by the usual quitclaim deed to the purchaser thereof."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, that is satisfactory.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site upon which to erect a building for the post office, courts, and other branches of the Government service at Newark, N. J., at a limit of cost not exceeding $600,000, or, in his discretion, to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land adjoining the site upon which the Federal building at Newark, N. J., now stands, and remodel, rearrange, and enlarge the present building at a limit of cost not to exceed the said sum of $600,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on pages 45 and 46, by striking out all of section 18 and inserting in lieu thereof the following as section 19:

"SEC. 19. That for the purpose of providing adequate accommodations for the post office, courts, and other branches of the Government service at Newark, N. J., the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land adjoining the site upon which the Federal building at Newark, N. J., stands, and remodel, rearrange, and enlarge the present building and remodel, rearrange, and enlarge any or all buildings on said additional land that may be acquired, at a limit of cost not to exceed the cost of $600,000."

Mr. MANN. As the Clerk reported the amendment it was to strike out section 18.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is a mistake. It is section 19. He made a mistake in reading the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to sell, at public or private sale, for such sum as in his judgment he may deem proper, the lot now owned by the Government of the United States in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., which said lot is bounded by Penn Avenue, Liberty Avenue, Fifteenth Street, and Sixteenth Street, and pay the proceeds of such sale into the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

For the enlargement, remodeling, and repairing the present Federal building at Pittsburgh, Pa., including all changes in, extension of, or additions and repairs to the mechanical equipment which may be made necessary by reason of such enlargement, remodeling, or repairing of said building, not to exceed $50,000.

The Clerk reported the committee amendment, as follows:

Insert, after the word "proceeds," in line 28, the following: "of such sale into the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If we are considering this bill by sections and not by paragraphs, before a committee amendment can be reported the entire section should be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk had not finished reading the section.

The Clerk completed the reading of the section.

The committee amendment was reported, as follows:

Add, on page 46, at the end of line 25, by inserting the following: "of such sale into the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 22, after the word "proper," insert "but not less than $750,000."

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer that amendment for the reason that that property was purchased about 11 years ago, and this lot described in the section has been held by the Government ever since. The property has really decreased in value evidently all along. No Secretary of the Treasury from that time to this has seen fit to recommend that a building be put on that property, and the property was estimated just about a year ago by several business men and real estate firms who wrote on the subject and estimated it to be worth less than half the value of $750,000.

I believe Congress, however, about four years ago passed a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell that property at $750,000. It seems he has been unable to get a sale for that up to this time, but in the past few months large interests have started a movement in that direction, and I received a letter day before yesterday from certain parties in the city, a real estate firm, stating that they felt they could secure, if they had a short option, $750,000, or the price that was named by the bill that passed this Congress. Now, that has been substantiated by other rumors, and I feel that the United States Government can receive for this property at least $750,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that the committee authorized the sale of this property, I think in 1913, at an upset price of $750,000, and have never been able to get an offer anywhere in that neighborhood. The committee thought at this time they would simply leave it to the discretion of the Treasury Department. I think the gentleman will agree that all the citizens of Pittsburgh, or practically all of them, agree that this is not the proper location for the Federal building.

Mr. GARLAND. I am not urging that as a location.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think the gentleman will agree this is not a proper location.

Mr. GARLAND. I do; yes. I have another amendment that I wish to offer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I intend to offer an amendment to this paragraph, in order to have it harmonious.

Mr. GARLAND. I would prefer the gentleman wait until my other amendment is acted on.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is one amendment pending that is rather inconsistent with the policy that has heretofore been adopted. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. GARLAND. I desire, if the gentleman prefers to offer an amendment, to have this amendment go up to the desk first and be read. It is to the same paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. You have not offered it?

Mr. GARLAND. I have it here. I was discussing the other.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wanted to direct an inquiry to either one or both.

Mr. GARLAND. They are separate. There should be a different vote on them. In the light of the statement I have just made there is strong evidence that $750,000 can be secured for that property, and we ought to put in the bill a provision to sell it for no less sum in light of the fact that the same large interests are now attempting to sell to the Government another lot.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he would not withhold his amendment for an amendment to perfect the section. The gentleman from Wisconsin has such an amendment.

Mr. MANN. It is in conflict with this amendment. Why should we not set an upset price?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not know what the gentleman's amendment is.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin wants the Secretary of the Treasury to set his own price on it. There has been so much crooked work about the purchase of this site in Pittsburgh before that we ought to be careful.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; we have fixed the upset price.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he thinks it is possible to obtain that price.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am not objecting to the upset price, but it seems to me the proposition of the gentleman should go.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's amendment will result in selling this property at half a million dollars instead of three-quarters of a million dollars, if it depends on the Treasury experts; and the opinion of the Treasury experts in the purchase of this property has not been worth anything.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, the amendment I intend to offer is not in any way conflicting with the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND]. It provides that property shall not be sold for less than the value set by the appraisal, and then there would also be the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it should not be less than $750,000. The appraisal might be $900,000 or $1,000,000.

Mr. GARLAND. I am willing to include that.

Mr. MANN. I think in the Dallas, Tex., provision they struck out $1,000,000, because it was in conflict with the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did it, because I thought, and I still think, that we are not in a position here in Congress to determine the value of property. It must be an administrative function. Of course, in this case there has been, too, but maybe there has been some questionable procedure in connection with it, and therefore in view of that statement I would not offer my amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman, but offer it as a separate amendment later on.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What is his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 22, after the word "proper," insert "at not less than $750,000."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. There is another amendment there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARLAND: Page 46, line 26, after the word "States," strike out all of the line, and all of line 27, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to be held in a fund to apply on the purchase of a suitable lot or piece of ground in said city."

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering that amendment is that the money, whatever it may be, is secured by the sale of the lot, which is contemplated now, and will be held in the Treasury Department for the purpose of purchasing other ground there. Pittsburgh about 40 years ago was permitted to build a post office by an appropriation. From that time up to this they have never had another building of any kind, and they have grown to that extent that the statements that have been made concerning Chicago, Philadelphia, and other places fit Pittsburgh exactly. Eleven years ago this appropriation was made for the purpose of purchasing a piece of ground. Nine hundred and forty thousand dollars, I believe, they paid for it.

Now, the Government has held that land ever since and refused to put a building on it, and as a consequence we have been renting every old shack around the town that we could get for post-office and Federal office purposes. We are paying now over $75,000 a year rentals for outside buildings, and because of this particular ground being undesirable we have been unable to get an appropriation to put a building anywhere else. The ground was there, and the Government authorities felt that we were not entitled to purchase anything else while it was on their hands.

Now, if they sell it, the funds that are there should immediately, so far as they will go, be applied toward the purchasing of a suitable piece of ground, so that we can then get an appropriation through the next Congress to build a building and relieve the situation there.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, we shall certainly have to oppose that amendment. The idea of allowing the money to be held in a separate fund whenever this lot is sold is unusual. We are carrying $50,000 in the bill to provide for the temporary needs of Pittsburgh, waiting until this property can be sold and another site can be purchased. The money will be available. The gentleman need not be afraid of that. But this would be unusual. We are opposed to putting aside trust funds of this character.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not know whether it is known to the gentleman or not, but this $50,000 that he speaks of will not bring back into the post-office building any of the different departments that have been put outside. It will only relieve us of the congestion that now is so overpowering that something must be done temporarily. It will not give us any permanent relief.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But, Mr. Chairman, there is no earthly necessity for taking this action. This lot was bought some years ago for something over $900,000. It was absolutely unsuitable, and we have not been able to sell the land for even half a million dollars since. I doubt if we could get it to-day. We are certainly opposed to selling the property and converting it into a trust fund to be expended hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I will ask permission to submit to this particular section another amendment after a while.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 46, line 21, after the word "sale," strike out the remainder of the line and the words "deem proper," in line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "at not less than the value as determined by the appraisal thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this would leave in the qualifying clause of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND], which would immediately follow "not less than $750,000," so that it is not inconsistent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, to follow the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] and which was adopted—the first one.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD, to follow the amendment of Mr. GARLAND: "and conveyed by the usual quitclaim deed."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed upon a suitable site to be selected by him, together with the Secretary of War, upon land already owned by the Government of the United States at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, an armory building for the National Guard of the District of Columbia, in accordance with the plans for such armory submitted by the commission appointed by the act of Congress approved May 30, 1908, or such modified plans as may be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War, at a limit of cost not to exceed the sum of $800,000: Provided, That one half of this amount shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States and the remaining half shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Amend, on page 47, by striking out all of section 22 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 22. That the commission created by section 17 of the act approved May 30, 1908, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected, under the supervision of the Secretary of War, upon a suitable site to be selected by them upon the advice of the National Commission of Fine Arts, upon land already owned by the Government of the United States in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, an armory building for the National Guard of the District of Columbia in accordance with the plans for such armory submitted by said commission, or such modified plans as may be approved by the Secretary of War, at a limit of cost not to exceed the sum of $800,000: Provided, That one-half of this amount shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States and the remaining half shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Florida kindly explain what the commission is that was created by the act of May 30, 1908?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will state to the gentleman that there was a commission created and given charge of this building, this armory, under the supervision of the Secretary of War. When we drew this provision we did not know of it, or it had passed out of our minds, and we put it under the Treasury Department. Col. Harts called it to my attention and stated that they had ample means and architects and facilities, and so forth, in the War Department, and that they wanted it especially constructed under the War Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then there is an existing commission to take charge of this work referred to in the amendment offered by the gentleman?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The commission consists of the Assistant Secretary of War, the general commanding the National Guard of the District of Columbia, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds in Washington, and the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds. That is the commission created by this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. That would consist, the gentleman says, of one of the Assistant Secretaries of War?

Mr. DYER. The Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is only one assistant. Gen. Schofield sometimes acts as Acting Secretary. Then there would be the head of the militia, the gentleman says?

Mr. DYER. The general commanding the militia of the District.

Mr. STAFFORD. And Col. Harts and Mr. Elliot Woods?

Mr. DYER. Yes; that is the commission that was created.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the importance of this item.

Section 22 of this bill just read provides for a new armory building for the National Guard in the District of Columbia, and is in accord, substantially, with the provisions of the bill (H. R. 3624) that I introduced at the first session of this Congress. I also introduced a similar bill in the preceding Congress. At a hearing held by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds upon this bill (H. R. 3624) on February 2, 1916, it was the unanimous opinion of those qualified to speak upon this subject that there was the greatest possible need for a new armory building in this city. The hearings referred to were upon the bill which I introduced and which reference I heretofore made. The important needs of this building are many. Among them are the necessity for safeguarding and properly caring for more than $300,000 worth of Government property which is now stored in unsuitable and unsafe rented buildings without protection from fire. The Government is now paying some $16,000 a year rent for these buildings. The new building is also needed in order that the necessary provisions can be had for the training and instructing of the members of the District of Columbia National Guard. It is impossible to give them these instructions in the present armories. It is also desired that the new armory shall provide moral and mental amusements and benefits for the men, as well as a swimming tank, bowling alleys, shooting galleries, riding hall, gymnasiums, library, and so forth. The city of Washington, the National Capital, has the poorest armories, and so forth, that are to be found practically in the country. There ought to be built here a model armory and one that will be the pride of the whole people and which will demonstrate to the world that the United States Government believes in its National Guard.

It is the intention to also give to the veterans of the Civil War and the Spanish War uses of this building. The intermingling thereof of the men of the National Guard with those who have seen service will cause a greater interest to be taken in military and National Guard affairs in the city of Washington. No place in the country has more splendid or worthy young men, or who have been more ready to offer their services to their country, than those who have been or who are members of the National Guard of the District of Columbia.

Brig. Gen. William E. Harvey, commanding the District of Columbia Militia, appeared before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on February 2 and, together with other officials of the United States Army and of the National Guard, testified to the great needs and importance of a new armory for the District of Columbia. The then Secretary of War, Lindley M. Garrison, indorsed the bill which I introduced. The late Gen. Albert L. Mills, of the United States Army and of the division of military affairs, also gave the bill the strongest possible indorsement, as did Col. William W. Harts, United States Army and the superintendent of public buildings and grounds. Brig. Gen. Harvey prepared and had printed in the hearings of February 2, 1916, a memorandum in support of the bill (H. R. 3624), and which I call the attention of the Members of the Congress to in order that they may be fully informed as to the necessity of this legislation. I refer specially to a part of the memorandum. He says:

The National Guard of the District of Columbia is a Federal force created by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 774), and the act of February 18, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 629). The President of the United States is its commander in chief, and it is under the immediate supervision of the War Department.

The following is a statement showing the organization and the number of officers and enlisted men, shown by the return for the quarter ending December 31, 1913:

[1] This includes 1 officer in Medical Reserve Corps.
[2] This includes 77 men carried on reserve list.

For a quarter of a century it has struggled along without any proper provision being made for housing it. It has been quartered in rented buildings of various sorts, none of which have afforded the requisite facilities for training the troops and caring for the equipment, which is the property of the United States.

The entire unsatisfactory and even discreditable accommodations for this organization have been commented upon year after year by the inspecting officers of the United States. A personal inspection of the buildings discloses the fact that these reports are not exaggerated, but are well founded in fact.

The organization at the present time is scattered about the city in nine different buildings, none of which are fireproof and none of which afford enough room for the keeping of the equipment. Some of the buildings have no provision at all for drilling the troops, and the troops are compelled to drill in the streets. For these unsatisfactory, uninviting, and inadequate buildings an annual rental of $16,900 is paid.

Notwithstanding the lack of armor facilities, the National Guard of the District of Columbia has keep up a force which has worked diligently to conform to the requirements of the War Department at a very great sacrifice on the part of the officers and men, who have devoted their time and energy and, in many instances, money to promoting the welfare of the organization and bringing it to a point where it could be considered as efficient.

Since 1887 about 33,000 individuals, officers and men, have served in this organization. The training which they have received in some instances has been thorough and others not, but all of them received some instruction which would be valuable in the event that the United States was forced to call for a large force of volunteers. The value of this military training may be very great to the country in time of stress.

At the outbreak of the Spanish War the entire National Guard volunteered, and one regiment was permitted to enter the service. It served creditably in Cuba, and was present in the trenches when Santiago surrendered. The Member of Congress, Hon. L. C. DYER, who introduced the bill under consideration, served in this regiment. In addition to this regiment, it furnished officers and men to some of the so-called "immune" regiments and to the United States Volunteer Engineers, and during the Philippine insurrection it furnished many officers and men to the United States Volunteers organized for service in the Philippines.

At the present time there are more than 25 officers in the United States Army, serving there creditably, who received early military training in the District of Columbia National Guard. One of them has been awarded the congressional medal of honor for distinguished gallantry and two of them have been selected to captain the Army Infantry team in the great rifle competitions.

Past duty well done, as well as future activity in the training of citizens to defend the flag in time of national danger, justifies the expenditure for a complete armory in the District of Columbia—one which will adequately provide for this brigade of troops and serve as a model to the State organizations.

If the United States is to rely in large part upon the militia; if the militia of the several States is to be maintained and trained to the standard of efficiency which the military authorities of the United States deem necessary; if, as experience has shown, adequate armories are an absolute necessity in that maintenance and training, it would seem the part of wisdom on the part of the Federal Government to supply its own Organized Militia in the District of Columbia, which is within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, with an armory which will be a model in every way and which can stand as an object lesson to the many State national guardsmen who visit the National Capital, that they may take home with them ideas as to what is desirable in armory construction.

The National Guard of the District of Columbia is a Federal force organized by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1889 (25 Stat. L., 772), as amended by the act of February 18, 1909 (35 Stat. L., 629). It differs from the State militia in that it is directly under the command of the President of the United States all the time.

The Constitution provides:

"The President shall be the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States."

As will appear below, the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the National Guard of the District of Columbia, just as he is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. That the provision of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat., 873), which authorizes the demolition of the present Federal building and the construction of a new post office and courthouse upon the site thereof at Madison, Wis., at a limit of cost of $550,000, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury further, in his discretion, to sell the present post office and courthouse and the site thereof in said city to the highest bidder, at public or private sale, in such manner and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States, to convey said property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quitclaim deed and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt: Provided, however, That if such sale is made before the completion and occupancy of the new Federal building hereinafter authorized, the agreement of sale shall reserve to the United States the right to continue to occupy said present Federal building property free of rent for not exceeding three years from the date of such sale.

That if the Secretary of the Treasury elects so to sell the present Federal building property, he is hereby further authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site in said city and to contract for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults mechanical equipment, and approaches, complete, for the use and accommodation of the post office, United States courts, and other governmental offices in said city, at a cost for said new site and building of not exceeding $550,000.

That if the Secretary of the Treasury elects so to sell said present Federal building property, the appropriations of $200,000 and $15,000 made by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1915 (38 Stat., 825), for the demolition of the present Federal building and commencement of a new building on the site thereof and for temporary quarters and moving expenses, be, and the same are hereby, made available for the acquisition of such new site and the commencement of the erection thereon of the new building authorized in the next preceding paragraph hereof.

That if a new building is erected on the present Federal building site, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may disregard the provision requiring 40 feet open space for fire protection.

Mr. CLARE of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 49, section 27, strike out the entire section, beginning in line 16, down to and including line 13, on page 51.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the reason that the provision included in that paragraph is already law. It was passed in September as a separate bill. Therefore there is no necessity for it in this bill, and I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the chairman of the committee to strike out the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that the motion is to strike out the first paragraph of section 27?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. To strike out the entire section.

Mr. STAFFORD. May we have the amendment reported again?

The amendment was again read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment as a new section 27.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 51, after line 13, insert the following as a separate section:

"SEC. 27. That the so-called Army Building and the site thereof, at the corner of Robert and Second Streets, in St. Paul, Minn., are hereby transferred to the custody and control of the Treasury Department; that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to remodel, enlarge, rearrange, repair, and improve said property as may be necessary for the accommodation and convenience of the business of the United States, at a cost not exceeding $50,000; and the Secretary shall assign space in said building to such offices of the War Department and other branches of the public service as he deems requisite for the proper transaction of the public business."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman kindly make some explanation of that amendment? It is a new item.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, on account of the condition of my throat I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VAN DYKE] to make a statement concerning this amendment.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Chairman, by this amendment it is proposed to relieve the congested condition of the Federal building in the city of St. Paul. Some time ago the city of St. Paul deeded to the War Department a parcel of land on Robert Street near Second, for the purpose of erecting a building to house the Quartermaster's Department for the Department of the Northwest. About three years ago the Quartermaster's Department was removed to the city of Chicago, leaving this building vacant, and it has been vacant ever since. The congested condition of the Federal building in the city of St. Paul renders it necessary to make some provision in order to carry on the business of the Government, and instead of asking for a new building we thought it would be better to transfer the title from the War Department to the Treasury Department, or to have the War Department transfer the custody of this building to the Treasury Department, and ask for a slight appropriation in order to remodel the building, so that we could not only take care of the incoming and outgoing mails of the city, but also use certain floors of the building for offices for the War Department and other departments, to house their agents in the city of St. Paul.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has this proposal the approval of the War Department?

Mr. VAN DYKE. It has the approval of both the War Department and the Treasury Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I should like, in my time, to have the Clerk read a little classical poem which may or may not refer to the bill in question.

The Clerk read as follows:

From The Romany Rye, the following quotation concerning "Poisoning the Porker," or, as rendered in the Gypsy language, "Drabbing the Baulo," may be in order:

"Listen to me, ye Roman lads who are seated in the straw about the fire, and I will tell how we poison the porker—I will tell how we poison the porker.

"We go to the house of the poison monger, where we buy 3 pennies' worth of bane, and when we return to our people we say, 'We will poison the porker; we will try and poison the porker.'"

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object to this. It is not a discussion of the bill or of any amendment pending. I make the point of order against the further reading of that document, because it does not refer to the bill and is not germane to anything in it. Enough of it has been read to show that fact.

Mr. KENT. I ask leave to print the remainder of it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the remainder of it in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am going to object to that. I do not want this bill all mixed up with a lot of stuff like that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida objects.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 51, between lines 13 and 14, amend by inserting a new section, to be designated as section 27½, to read as follows:

"SEC. 27½. That section 26 of the public-building act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats. L., p. 886), which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into a contract or contracts for the erection of fireproof laboratories for the Bureau of Mines in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., etc., and the act of Congress approved December 22, 1913 (38 Stats. L., p. 251), which amends said section 26, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to increase the limit of cost therein fixed from $500,000 to $550,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment, section 27½, offered by the chairman of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That the provision of the act of Congress, approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 872), authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the erection and completion of a suitable building for the post office and other governmental offices at Syracuse, N. Y., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to increase the limit of cost for said building from $550,000 to $800,000, and to authorize the provision of accommodations for the United States courts and the installation of mail-handling apparatus to facilitate the postal business of said building, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, after the completion of the said building at Syracuse, N. Y., and after public advertisement, to sell the old post-office building and the site thereof at such time and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States, and to convey said property to the purchasers thereof by the usual quitclaim deed, and to deposit the proceeds in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt: Provided, however, That the said old post-office building and site shall not be sold for less than $250,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 3, after the word "sell," insert the following: "at public or private sale, but at not less than the value as determined by an appraisal thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD with reference to the McNeil Island item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Amend, page 52, by inserting between lines 10 and 11 a new section to be designated as section 28½, to read as follows:

"SEC. 28½. The act approved October 20, 1914 (38 Stats., p. 740), providing for a new building for an assay office in New York City be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to increase the limit of cost therein fixed from $607,408 to $807,408."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is an increase of $200,000 for authorization of the assay office in New York City. I think there ought to be some explanation given by some member of the committee.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, a gentleman representing the Treasury Department and the Director of the Mint several days ago were before the committee and made a showing of the very dangerous condition at the assay office, where sums of money are being kept without any adequate means of storage. They insisted that the emergency was so great that immediate action ought to be taken to report an emergency bill. I think every member of the committee who heard the statement was of the opinion that it was hazardous to keep the money of the Government in that condition at this time. Some of it was out in the hall and they had to have extra guards for the purpose of taking care of the money.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. LANGLEY. The hazard was so great with reference to the keeping of the public funds that the committee thought it ought not to print all that was said in the hearings.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; the hazard was so great that the details were not printed by the committee. We thought they ought not to be printed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I recall now that the condition the gentleman has called my attention to was brought to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, and I know there is pressing need for new vaults for the Government to make provision for the enormous increase in gold from Europe.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Alabama. Has the contract been let for this building, or what is the status?

Mr. BURNETT. They advertised for bids, but no bids could be secured under the limit.

Mr. WINGO. Does this proposition contemplate the enlargement of the building that is authorized?

Mr. BURNETT. No; it does not. They will necessarily have to use a good deal of steel, and the price of steel has increased to such an extent that the building can not be constructed within the limit of cost.

Mr. WINGO. I do not recall whether it was an item of this kind, but some time since I have been a Member of the House I recall that there was a proposition to increase the appropriation $200,000 in order to provide a more beautiful front for a building in New York. What building was that?

Mr. BURNETT. There is nothing of the kind here; this is absolutely for the protection of the increased influx of gold.

Mr. WINGO. What size building does the department contemplate building?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not remember the details. I do not think it is to be enlarged; it is to build the building that was originally contemplated.

Mr. WINGO. Does the Government own the ground upon which it is proposed to erect the building?

Mr. LANGLEY. As I recall it, the Government does own the land. As the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] has stated, this extra appropriation is needed to complete the building under the plans originally formed because the original appropriation was not sufficient to construct the building owing to the increased price of material.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman says the Government does own the land?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. What size of building is it proposed to erect?

Mr. SUMNERS. As I understand, the building is to be six or seven stories high.

Mr. WINGO. Is it to be a new building?

Mr. SUMNERS. It is to be a new building. As stated by the gentleman from Alabama, the Government is now unable to erect the contemplated building because of the advance in the price of steel. It was stated to our committee that about 80 per cent of the cost of the material for the entire building will be for steel, and, as the gentleman knows, the price of steel has greatly advanced, that explains the necessity for the increase in the appropriation.

Mr. WINGO. How many millions constitute the maximum of gold that office has ever had?

Mr. SUMNERS. The gentleman will permit me to continue the statement——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, the urgent necessity, as has been explained by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], arises from the fact that they are compelled to handle an unprecedented quantity of gold coming to the United States from causes which the gentleman well understands.

Mr. WINGO. That is the reason I am asking the question. What is the greatest volume they have to take care of in their vaults?

Mr. SUMNERS. It runs up into hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. LANGLEY. Six hundred million dollars at one time.

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes; over half a billion of dollars.

Mr. WINGO. Let us say it is $832,000,000. What sized vault would it take to hold that much gold?

Mr. SUMNERS. The gentleman is going into details that I would have to submit to the architect; but I will state this to the gentleman: A condition was brought to the attention of this committee, such that I do not believe the gentleman would even ask us to state——

Mr. WINGO. I know what the gentleman is referring to; but the situation with reference to sufficient vault room to take care of some $800,000,000 dollars of gold in a six-story building is such that I would like to know why it is necessary to spend the $200,000 more on a six-story building, and why it is necessary to build a six-story building to take care of that much gold.

Mr. SUMNERS. I do not believe that the building is to be used entirely as a vault.

Mr. LANGLEY. Not by any means.

Mr. SUMNERS. There are employees of the Government who will handle this gold, who will be housed in this building.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman knows that this increased volume of gold is unprecedented and it is not supposed to last very long. The plans we now have will take that gold away from there and put it into the vaults of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Since the consideration of the items in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill providing for the maintenance of Subtreasuries, it has been called to our attention the Federal reserve banks have no provision whatsoever for the deposit of Government funds such as bullion and gold.

Mr. WINGO. Has any one of the Federal reserve banks at any time asked that the Federal Government provide it with a building at public expense?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. The Federal reserve banks, as is pointed out in a letter written by the Secretary of the Treasury, are private banks, and are totally apart from any governmental function.

Mr. WINGO. That is what I say. This building could not possibly be erected in time to meet the present emergency on account of the extraordinary volume of gold.

Mr. SUMNERS. I direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is the building authorized a long time ago.

Mr. WINGO. Authorized two years ago, nearly three years ago, but it has not yet been started.

Mr. SUMNERS. When conditions were normal.

Mr. WINGO. And it will take, as the gentleman knows, two or three years to erect a Government building of that size. Is not this $200,000 item intended solely for purposes of construction to be used on what they call the façade?

Mr. SUMNERS. Not at all. My recollection is that this building is to be constructed behind the other which the Government now occupies. Every statement made before this committee bore directly upon the necessity arising out of the increased price of material, steel especially, which makes up some eighty-odd per cent of the cost of the building which it is contemplated to have erected on the lot now owned by the Government.

Mr. WINGO. It is thought it will take $200,000 additional to provide for the additional vault room for $800,000,000 of gold.

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINGO. But the gentleman of the committee has no statistics as to the size of the vault to hold that much gold.

Mr. SUMNERS. No, sir. I will say to the gentleman that the committee was convinced this expenditure is necessary, and not only necessary but urgently necessary.

Mr. BURNETT. I will state to the gentleman what I have already stated, that I would have been better informed in regard to the matter, but it was insisted it was an emergency matter, and since then I have not refreshed my recollection.

Mr. WINGO. It is a well-known fact that the Federal Reserve Board not only asked, but the governor appeared before our committee to-day, asking——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will permit, unless this authorization is made it is utterly impossible to go to the construction of the building at all. Now, the superintendent of the mint and the custodian over there, the gentleman in charge of this, were before our committee and they stated distinctly that they had advertised for bids and had not gotten a single bid anywhere within reach of the authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. The reason for that is plain. They have intended ever since I have been in Congress to get this $200,000 additional, and that is the reason they did not get an answer to their bid.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we are getting along pretty well with the bill, and I crave the indulgence of the committee for a moment or two in reference to a matter that is not in this bill, however I wish it were. The original Capitol Building, as we all know, did not include the wings now occupied as the House and Senate Chambers with various offices connected with them, but the original Capitol Building, including the original Senate Chamber, is now in part occupied by the Supreme Court of the United States. Everybody who has anything whatever to do with the Supreme Court, or made any investigation relating to the Supreme Court, has known that the quarters which they have are very scant and insufficient. There was a suggestion made some years ago to construct a Department of Justice building, or a Supreme Court building, on the square north of the Library of Congress, but it was understood at that time, unofficially, that the members of the Supreme Court did not desire that the Supreme Court should leave the Capitol Building itself, and I honor them for that opinion. I think it adds to the dignity of the country that the Supreme Court of the United States be located in the Capitol Building of the United States. It is quite feasible, however, to enlarge the quarters of the Supreme Court building by extending the old Capitol Building front easterly to meet the line of the two wings of the Capitol. There is not a single item in this bill, in my opinion, that is of as much importance as to do that one thing, and I am sorry that is not in the bill. I am calling attention to it in the hope, it probably having never been called to the attention of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, that that committee will investigate somewhat in reference to the matter.

The members of the Supreme Court of the United States can not go lobbying. They can not permit one of their employees to go lobbying. It is beneath their dignity, properly so, to even make a representation in reference to the matter. I had occasion some years ago to look into the matter somewhat—possibly I have been negligent since—when we provided for the House Office Building and the distribution of rooms there and elsewhere. Members of the Supreme Court now are so fixed that it is impossible for them to have ready access to the books which they are using all the time. A man on the Supreme Court of the United States, studying the law cases, ought to be able to reach at his elbow almost for a book, ought to be able to get it without difficulty, ought to be able to have sufficient quarters to carry on his business in the Capitol of the country. Far better for them and for us that they do their work in chambers in the main or where the other justices are than to do what they have been required to do, do most of their work at their own homes without sufficient library facilities. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not necessary; it is a committee amendment, and all you have to do is to vote it down.

Mr. WINGO. That is right; it is a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment is still pending.

Mr. WINGO. And that amendment provides for $200,000 additional for the assay office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that something ought to be said to show the practice of those who are charged with the duty of administering the laws providing for the expenditure of public funds.

Some years ago the Secretary of the Treasury called attention to the fact that adequate safeguards did not exist for the enormous deposits of gold in the city of New York, which were unavoidable in the transaction of the public business, and proposed a plan to build storage vaults under the Assay Office Building, most of which would be below the water line, and thus impossible of penetration by tunneling or subterranean methods. An appropriation was made for that purpose. Subsequently it was ascertained that an additional sum would be required to do the work, and that money was voted.

It was then decided that the building itself should be remodeled, and a request was made for legislation enabling that to be done, and also for authority to employ the services of engineers who were skilled in construction work involving excavations below the foundations of the very tall buildings which had to be supported, and that was done. And after all the money was appropriated and all of the authority asked for was granted, some one proposed that the Assay Office be sold and a new site acquired and a new building erected, because some one complained that the fumes from the Assay Office were offensive to the tenants of some particular office building. Instead of proceeding with the work of providing for the accommodations for the security of the gold of the United States, several years were frittered away in the idle attempt to have Congress gratify the whim of some new official who thought he had discovered something advantageous or different. The result is that in the corridors of the Assay Office in New York, piled in heaps like bags of grain, are boxes of gold bullion and coin, with no place to store them, no place to put them, but piled there like stone heaps in the public streets. In the meantime, with all of this dillydallying and suggesting and frittering away of time, the work that could have been done and completed if began promptly and at the time it should have been commenced, can not now be done within several hundred thousand dollars of the original estimated cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more, because it is a very interesting statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And so, Mr. Chairman, as the result of this method of transacting the public business, if this work is to be carried out it involves an expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars that could have been avoided. I am inclined to believe that it is not too much to expect that when Congress has provided for a great emergency for the safeguarding of the gold which is in the Treasury the officials charged with the duty should have been keen to have executed the law and to have properly safeguarded the gold. I do not know what can be done about the situation. There are not adequate facilities there at present. This gold can not be properly stored. I am not apprehensive of any very serious attempt being made to loot the Treasury or the Assay Office in New York, but reasonable precautions should be taken to safeguard such an enormous fortune. It is enough to tempt the cupidity of the most daring crooks that exist in the country. Yet because of the failure of certain officials to perform their public duties and discharge important public duties, the people are saddled with an additional expense of $200,000.

It is not a thing that concerns the city of New York. Whether provision be made properly to care for this gold or not there will always be a very enormous quantity of gold in the city of New York, because there international balances are settled. I do not intend to vote for this bill, so whatever happens to this amendment will not go to affect my position. I am opposed to the bill, and it is immaterial to me what happens to the amendment.

I did not take the floor for the purpose of discussing the merits of the amendment, but I thought the committee was entitled to information which explains the necessity for the proposed amendment. The work could have been practically finished within the original appropriations and an unnecessary expenditure of $200,000 avoided if those whose duty it was to do the work had complied with the law and performed their duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I want just three minutes. The statement of the gentleman is very interesting, and it emphasizes the contention which we have been making all this time that there has been criminal negligence and delay not only in this particular case but in dozens and perhaps hundreds of other cases, and therefore emphasizes the necessity for passing this measure which proposes to take the administration of these affairs out of the hands of those who have delayed them so long, and put it in the hands of somebody whom we hope will administer them with more judgment than those who have been administering them heretofore. The gentleman is absolutely correct in the statement that the principal necessity for this additional expenditure of $200,000 is on account of the increased price of the steel that is necessary to construct those buildings, which could have been obviated if the men having those matters in charge had performed their duty, and performed it some time ago, as they should have done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment, to be designated as section 28½.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 95, noes 6.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent now to turn to page 14, lines 16 and 17, to the Oakland, Cal., item, in order to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to return to page 14, lines 16 and 17.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be read. I reserve the right to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Strike out lines 16 and 17, on page 14, and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to contract for the acquisition, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of a new site, and for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, mechanical equipment, and approaches, complete, together with such mail-handling apparatus, etc., as he may deem advisable, for the use and accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices at Oakland, Cal., at a cost of not exceeding $1,000,000.

"And that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon the completion and occupancy of said new building, to sell the present public building and the site thereof in Oakland, Cal., at public or private sale, but at not less than the value as determined by an appraisal thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury, and at such time and upon such terms as he may deem advisable, to convey such property to the purchaser thereof by the usual quitclaim deed, and to deposit the proceeds of said sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is no limitation placed on the amount at which this property can be sold, is there?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no limitation.

Mr. MADDEN. There ought to be. It will not do to simply state that the Secretary of the Treasury can sell it at any price he thinks proper. If it is worth anything, they ought to know what it is worth.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I assume they would sell it for the appraised value, and they would get the appraisement in the authorized way and would be bound by that appraisement as a minimum.

Mr. MADDEN. There ought to be a minimum stated in the provision. It should be stated that it should not be sold at less than a certain amount.

Mr. ELSTON. Is not the gentleman from Illinois satisfied with the provision that the Secretary of the Treasury shall make an appraisement and that the property shall not be sold at less than the appraisement?

Mr. MADDEN. No. I want a limitation here that the appraisement shall not be less than a certain amount. It is either worth that amount or not worth that amount. Nobody knows whether this property is going to be given away or sold. The minimum figure ought to be stated at which it would be sold. That is what has been done in other cases, and there ought not to be an exception made in this case.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. The original amount is $650,000. Why not put the minimum amount that it is to be sold for as the difference between $650,000 and the amount you have named in the amendment?

Mr. ELSTON. I have no doubt but that the property can be sold for more than that figure, but if you intrust this matter to the Secretary of the Treasury and prescribe that he shall sell it at not less than a fair appraisement to be made under authority of law, I do not believe you will get anything less than the real value for the property. That is the usual procedure, so far as my memory goes now, that has been pursued in the case of any of these items where the authority has been given to sell an old site. I do not remember that an upset price was fixed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who is to make this appraisement?

Mr. ELSTON. The Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by this to sell it at private sale, so that the appraiser appraises it at what he thinks it is worth and that will be the price?

Mr. ELSTON. If it is sold at private sale the amount realized must be at least its appraised value.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The man that sells it can sell it at private sale for what he thinks it is worth. Does the gentleman think that any executive officer should take hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property belonging to this Government and sell it at private sale on any terms he pleases?

Mr. ELSTON. The Secretary of the Treasury, I am informed, will appoint an appraiser or appraisers who will appraise the property carefully, and there will be no authority to sell for less than such appraisement. It seems to me that is a safe procedure under which to sell Government property.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman certain that the appraisers will fix the value at which the property will be sold? How does he know? Has the gentleman any idea of what the property is worth?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. What is it worth?

Mr. ELSTON. I believe the property is worth anywhere from $300,000 to $400,000, according to the market.

Mr. MADDEN. That is a good deal of a margin.

Mr. ELSTON. I believe a fair value would be at least $350,000, but I would not be willing to see a clause put in here limiting the sale price to a figure above that amount, because that would be putting a special clause in here with regard to this proposition that has been put in with respect to other similar items.

Mr. MADDEN. It was put in the item with respect to Pittsburgh. I do not see why an exception should be made here.

Mr. ELSTON. In the Pittsburgh case the Government purchased the site many years ago for $941,000. There might be some reason in that case to put an upset price of $941,000 so that the Government would at least get back the money invested.

In the case of Oakland the price paid for the original site and building combined was only $250,000. Now, I am told that the site alone is worth $350,000. The gentleman will take note of this important fact: Additional ground was purchased in 1913, for which $153,000 was paid, to enlarge the present site. I would not want to fix a minimum sale price and have it inserted in the bill, thereby prejudicing this proposition. I do not think that would be advisable in view of the appraisement clause carried in my amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman says that recently $153,000 were expended for the purchase of additional property to enlarge the present site?

Mr. ELSTON. That is correct.

Mr. MADDEN. Now the gentleman comes in with a proposition to sell the property for which $153,000 was recently paid, and also the property it was intended to enlarge, and the building which stands upon the property that was originally purchased, and to purchase a new site. What special interest is involved in the case that requires the purchase of a new site?

Mr. ELSTON. The Secretary of the Treasury personally visited this site within the last two months. He made a reconnaissance of the whole situation, and when he returned to Washington he addressed a letter to the Speaker of the House—House Document No. 1776, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session—in which he recommended that the present site be sold, notwithstanding his previous recommendation, upon which the item went into the bill appropriating a certain amount to put a new building on the present site. His letter to the Speaker sets forth in detail the valid reasons for the proposed change.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELSTON. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELSTON. The Secretary of the Treasury gives very cogent reasons why the proposed amendment which I have offered, in the very words suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury himself, should be adopted. This is not a proposition of my own. It was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and with the approval of the principal interests of the city of Oakland itself. So if the gentleman feels that there is some kind of a joker, I will advise that this is an absolutely bona fide proposition, and the Government probably will save about $50,000 on the whole transaction; because it is my belief, although I am not willing to put such a limitation into the bill, that the present site will bring $500,000 after the lapse of time necessary for the completion of the new building. Oakland now has a population of nearly 250,000 and is increasing at the rate of about 25,000 a year. The postal receipts within the last quarter indicate an increase of over $50,000 during the present year, which will make a total of over $650,000 for this fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury visited California only a few months ago, as I understand the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] to say. While he was there he was waited upon by a number of business men of the city of Oakland, who urged upon him the necessity of abandoning the present site, the purchase of which he recommended only a short time before, and he recommended the sale of that site in order that a new site might be purchased. He not only recommended the abandonment of the site the purchase of which he recommended, but also the abandonment of the building; and when the property is sold, if it is sold according to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, every man here knows that the building will be given away.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. ELSTON. Under the present appropriation of $650,000 it is contemplated that the present building will be demolished, so that in either case the Government will lose the value of the improvement now on the property.

Now, I will state to the gentleman that the whole investment of the Government in the building and site is $250,000.

Mr. MADDEN. And $153,000 of that was only invested a short time ago.

Mr. ELSTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I meant $250,000 was the original investment, and $153,000 is to be added to it.

Mr. MADDEN. That makes $403,000. The Secretary of the Treasury and the business men of Oakland only a short time since thought the present site was all right for this public building. If the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that the present site was good is worth anything, then his present recommendation that it is no good is worth nothing. I submit that the House ought not to be trifled with in any such way as this amendment proposes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Have we not some regular system of disposing of old buildings and property that there is no longer use for?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not talking about the disposition of the property, I am talking about encouraging the purchase of property to-day on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and then on the recommendation of the same Secretary of the Treasury, sell the property to-morrow.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has that been the practice heretofore?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why do not we follow the usual practice?

Mr. MADDEN. The practice in this case is to let the site purchased on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury stand and put the new building upon it. Who knows what we will have to pay for a new site; who knows what we will be able to get a new site for? Who knows how much money this will cost in the end? Who knows the interests behind the sale of this property? Who knows what interest is behind the purchase of new property? I am not willing as one Member of the House to act upon a question of this sort in any such slipshod manner.

Mr. ELSTON. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that the new site will cost $450,000?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know; if I knew anything about it I would not be here on my feet. Nobody is able to tell anything about it. If the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury has no more stability than these recommendations, they ought not to be acted upon.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, this site was provided for——

Mr. MADDEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have the floor and the gentleman can not take me off my feet.

Mr. MADDEN. I simply wanted to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I was on my feet, but waiting for the Chairman to get order. I simply want to say that the provision for the purchase of this land was made in 1913, four years ago, and the provision which is offered here is the same provision which the gentleman from Wisconsin offered for various other items providing for the appraisal of the property, and the Secretary of the Treasury can not sell it for any less than its appraised value. Now, we have to trust somebody. Congress can not tell exactly what every piece of property all over the country is worth, and we have to leave it to the discretion of some one. The gentleman from Wisconsin offered these amendments, and I think they were wise and discreet.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Florida state to the House that he thinks that it is wise to sell property recently purchased in Oakland and buy a new piece of property?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The purchase of the property was authorized under the act of 1913. I do not know when it was bought, but that was when it was provided for. It was then thought that an addition to the old building would be sufficient. But the city has grown to such an enormous extent, and conditions there are such as to make it advisable, instead of enlarging that building, to sell the old property and buy a new site and put up a new building.

Mr. MADDEN. It is proposed to put up a new building in any event, is it not?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It is now; yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Even though you use the old site?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Absolutely.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not use the old site and put the new building on it?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, in 1906, at the time of the earthquake and fire at San Francisco, Oakland was a city of 60,000 inhabitants. After the disaster a great many of the citizens of San Francisco moved to Oakland and remained there. To-day, 10 years after that event, it is a city of nearly 250,000 inhabitants, and the business center of the city has changed. The city has expanded and is growing rapidly and constantly. This post-office site is no longer desirable. That is the reason for this proposition. You all know that when a city grows rapidly not only does it expand but the business center frequently changes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. When was this addition to the present site purchased?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think it is more than two or three years ago.

Mr. MADDEN. It is a good deal less than 10 years ago, is it not?

Mr. KAHN. The city has been growing by leaps and bounds.

Mr. MADDEN. It must have been considered a good site two years ago?

Mr. KAHN. No; it was considered a good site four years ago.

Mr. MADDEN. This was purchased less than two years ago.

Mr. KAHN. I think it was purchased in 1913.

Mr. MADDEN. No; it was authorized in that year.

Mr. KAHN. It was purchased——

Mr. MADDEN. It was purchased about two years afterwards. If it was considered a good site in 1915 it ought still to be considered a good site, or the men who made the purchase ought to be reprimanded for making such a purchase.

Mr. KAHN. I have seen the business center of Oakland change twice within 14 or 15 years. The principal street 15 years ago is no longer the principal street.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Is it not a fact that the old site, the present site, is not within free delivery distance of the railroad station? I understand that to be the fact—that it is more than 80 rods.

Mr. ELSTON. It is a mile.

Mr. SUMNERS. That perhaps is one of the main things that influenced the Treasury Department in determining on a change.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I ask the gentleman if, as the gentleman says, the population has increased enormously in 10 years, which is a matter of common knowledge, and a site was purchased and advantageously located two years ago, or last year, and the city is growing by leaps and bounds, had not we better wait a few years and see if it will not bound back to the place where it started?

Mr. KAHN. In the meantine we want accommodations for the people who are there, and the present site does not give them that service which they require.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman certainly does not expect to buy a new site every year?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; and the gentleman does not intend that they should purchase a new site every year. But the gentleman feels that a proper building at a proper place ought to be provided to do the Government's business.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 15, lines 19 and 20, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to return to page 15, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, let the amendment be first reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, lines 19 and 20, after the words "post office," in line 19, insert "land office," and in line 20 strike out "$55,000" and insert "$65,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Chairman, on page 36 of the bill there is a matter in reference to Porto Rico, about which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] inquired. There was something said about the sale of the warehouse property at Porto Rico. I did not have the letter of the Secretary at that time, but I now have it and I will send it up and ask to have the Clerk read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 7, 1916.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The Treasury Department is the custodian of the United States warehouse site at San Juan, P. R., which property the collector of customs at that port states is not needed for governmental purposes, as the present Federal building reservation and Government buildings are sufficient to take care of the needs of the Government for a great many years to come.

The title to this land is disputed by the present occupant, the Porto Rico Railway, Light & Power Co., and proceedings have been instituted to enforce the Government's rights. The company mentioned has offered to purchase the land, but the department was obliged to reply that there was no authority of law for such a sale.

It is recommended that authority be given by proper legislation for the sale of said property in such manner and upon such terms as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem to be for the best interests of the United States.

A draft of the desired legislation is inclosed.

Respectfully,

W. G. McADOO, Secretary.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, Mr. Chairman, I may state further, I am now informed that the Governor of Porto Rico is opposed to the sale of this property and the Secretary of War is also opposed to it, and therefore I am going to ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to strike section 10 from the bill. I offer the amendment to strike section 10 from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, beginning in line 17, strike out all of section 10.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 21, page 46, in order to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] an opportunity to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to return to section 21. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARLAND: Page 46, line 27, at the end of the paragraph, insert:

"If the Secretary finds that it is more feasible to buy additional land for a site for a post office adjacent to or near the present post-office building, he is hereby authorized to acquire such additional land by purchase or condemnation, and in that event the sum secured from said sale is hereby authorized to apply for the acquisition of said additional land."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there should be some limit of cost placed on the amount to be expended for the site to be purchased. Under this authorization the Secretary of the Treasury will be permitted to obligate the Government in any amount and utilize the fund that would arise from the sale of the property now owned by the Government as part payment under that purchase.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will permit me, I hardly think that that would be so. The only authorization for a site in this bill is from the proceeds from the sale of that site, and it would take a new authorization.

Mr. STAFFORD. The wording of the amendment is not limited in the way indicated by the gentleman from Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again read.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think certainly under that authorization the Secretary of the Treasury would have the right to purchase any tract of land, no matter what the price would be, and obligate the Government in an untold amount. There should be a limit of cost on the amount that may be expended for a site and a limit of cost not to exceed a certain amount.

Mr. BURNETT. I think the gentleman's conclusions are wrong, because there is no authorization except for the purchase of a site.

Mr. STAFFORD. After the word "condemnation" insert "at a limit of cost not to exceed the proceeds arising from the sale."

Mr. BURNETT. That is all right. How could he be authorized unless we give him the authorization?

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. GARLAND: Page 46, at the end of line 27, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"If the Secretary finds that it is more feasible to buy additional land for a site for a post office, adjacent to or near the present post-office building, he is hereby authorized to acquire such additional land by purchase or condemnation, at a limit of cost not to exceed the proceeds arising from said sale, and in that event the sum secured from said sale is hereby authorized to apply for the acquisition of said additional land."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say in behalf of the amendment that it was simply to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to use this money that he would secure from the sale of the lot as provided in section 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. That the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury be, and the same is hereby, abolished, and that there be, and hereby is, established in the Treasury Department a bureau to be designated and known as the bureau of public buildings. There shall be at the head of the bureau of public buildings an officer who shall be designated and known as the commissioner of public buildings, who, in addition to being a skilled architect, shall be a man of good business and executive ability, and he shall receive an annual salary of $7,500, to be paid monthly.

The commissioner of public buildings shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall be appointed for a term of four years, and before entering upon the discharge of the duties of his office he shall take and subscribe an oath in the same form as that required of other Government officials.

The commissioner of public buildings immediately upon entering upon the duties of his office shall proceed to organize the bureau of public buildings into an active body for the expeditious and economical drafting of plans and construction of such public buildings of the United States as have been or which may hereafter be authorized by the Congress of the United States, and to this end he may use any or all of the officers and employees now connected with the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and prescribe the services to be rendered and the duties to be performed by each, as well as to designate the official title of each such officer or employee.

The bureau of public buildings shall be controlled and directed by a committee of three persons, the commissioner of public buildings to be chairman and the remaining two members to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury from the force of the said bureau of public buildings.

The bureau of public buildings shall have jurisdiction over and control of the selection of all such sites for public buildings as have been or may be authorized by Congress, the drafting of plans and specifications for all public buildings which may be authorized by Congress, the supervision of the construction of all public buildings authorized by Congress, and in fact jurisdiction over and control of the entire matter of the construction of all Federal buildings until the same shall have been completed. And the said bureau shall have the custody, care, and maintenance of all completed Federal buildings throughout the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to buildings for the Military or Naval Establishments.

The commissioner of public buildings shall divide the States and Territories of the United States into not less than 6 nor more than 12 groups, in such manner as to have States and Territories of similar topography and climate as near as may be in the same group, and shall designate them by letter, beginning with the letter A. He shall likewise divide the towns and cities of each group which contain no Federal activity other than the post office into classes, as follows: All towns and cities in which the postal receipts for the preceding fiscal year amounted to not less than $10,000 nor more than $25,000 shall be placed in one class; all those where such receipts amounted to not less than $25,000 nor more than $40,000 shall be placed in another class; all those where such receipts were not less than $40,000 nor more than $75,000 shall be placed in another class; all those where such receipts were not less than $75,000 nor more than $150,000 shall be placed in another class; and all those with over $150,000 of such receipts shall be placed in another class, which classes shall be designated as Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, respectively.

After the States and Territories shall have been divided into groups, and such cities and towns shall have been divided into classes as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the commissioner of public buildings to standardize all public buildings authorized for any of the cities and towns included in such classes; that is to say, that whenever plans and specifications are drawn for a building to be constructed at a city or town included in any of the classes stated, such plans and specifications shall be used for buildings which may be authorized at other cities or towns of the same group and in the same class.

The commissioner of public buildings shall organize for each group of States and Territories herein provided for a field force of inspectors and other employees, who shall have the immediate supervision of all building construction in such group, and the custody, care, and maintenance of all public buildings within such group, under such rules and regulations as said commissioner of public buildings, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe. The Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint, upon the recommendation of the commissioner of public buildings, one person as chief inspector for each group, who shall have his office at some central place within such group, to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and said Secretary of the Treasury shall also appoint, upon the recommendation of the commissioner of public buildings, such other officers and employees as in his judgment may be necessary in each of such groups for the expeditious performance of the duties herein required.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to fix the compensation of each and every officer and employee included in the organization plan of the bureau of public buildings as arranged by the commissioner of public buildings, and to report the same in full detail to the Congress at its next session for ratification, amendment, or rejection.

That each chief inspector of each of the groups of States and Territories herein provided for shall immediately on entering upon the duties of his office proceed to ascertain the facts and, as soon as is possible, make a report to the commissioner of public buildings, in which he shall, by States and Territories, set forth the number of public buildings in each such State or Territory; the total cost of each building; the Federal activities housed in each building; the number of employees housed in each building, and the branch of the service in which each is employed; the date when each of such buildings was first occupied; additions, if any, which have been placed on each of such buildings, and additions to sites, the cost, and when made; the present condition of each of such buildings with reference to repairs and the necessity for repairs; the necessity, if any, as to enlargement; the name and salary of each employee who is employed to care for each of such buildings; and such other facts as may pertain thereto. And the commissioner of public buildings shall forward all of such reports to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall submit the same to Congress at its next succeeding session. And thereafter similar reports shall be submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the first session of each Congress.

In the purchase of sites for Federal building of any character, it shall be the duty of the bureau of public buildings in each and every case to provide for the purchase of sufficient lands so that the said building can be enlarged from time to time as the needs of the service and the Federal activities of the Government at the particular place may require, and that the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manner as now provided by law, shall purchase such sites as may be so selected by the bureau of public buildings.

That the bureau of public buildings shall require of owners or agents of sites in each case where a site is proposed to be purchased and where sites or additions to sites are proposed to be purchased, to submit offers of sale in writing, and in case the site or the addition to a site which it is proposed to acquire contains a building or buildings, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, upon the recommendation of the bureau of public buildings, to rent until their removal becomes necessary such of said buildings as may be purchased by the Government of the land upon which the same may be located, where the buildings are reserved by the vendors at a fair rental value, the proceeds thereof to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt, and a report of the proceedings to be submitted to Congress annually.

That in the purchase of sites for Federal buildings of any character, the bureau of public buildings shall be left free to select such sites without reference as to whether they are bounded upon more than one side by streets or alleys and are permitted, in their discretion, to select inside lots or sites for such purposes.

That proposals for the sale of land suitable for all sites or additions to sites, respectively, shall be invited by public advertisement in one of the newspapers of largest circulation of the cities involved for at least 20 days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals. Proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be mailed and addressed to the commissioner of public buildings, Treasury Department, Washington, D. C., who shall then cause the said proposed sites or additions to sites, as the case may be, and said other obtainable sites as would be suitable, to be examined in person by and through the field force having jurisdiction of the territory involved, and when such examination shall have been completed the chief inspector of the field force in such group shall make a written report to the said commissioner of public buildings of the results of said examination, and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to the said proposed sites.

In each case when a public building shall be authorized by Congress, the commissioner of public buildings shall submit to each department which is to have employees housed therein, if Federal activities other than the post office and the civil service are to be accommodated, tentative plans thereof for such suggestions as to space as such department or departments may desire to make: Provided, That no department shall retain such plans for more than five days, and in no event shall the approval of such plans by any department be necessary before proceeding with the construction of such building.

The commissioner of public buildings in all advertisements for bids for the construction of public buildings authorized by Congress shall ask for at least three separate bids, involving the use of three different kinds of materials, and one of these shall involve the use of local material, should there be suitable building material for such purpose within the State or Territory.

In the construction of Federal buildings at cities or towns where there are no Federal activities other than the post office and the civil service to be housed, it shall be the duty of the Bureau of Public Buildings to construct in all such cases a factory or block type of building in such manner that the same may be added to and enlarged as the needs of the Government may require.

There shall be in the bureau of public buildings a board of estimates, consisting of three persons, two of whom shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the third member shall be the commissioner of public buildings, who shall be the chairman of said board. It shall be the duty of such board of estimates, immediately upon the introduction of a bill in Congress proposing to purchase a site or to construct a Federal building, or both, to institute an investigation, through the field force in the proper group of States and Territories, or otherwise, and, as early as possible, report to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall at once forward the same to the committee of Congress having jurisdiction of the bill the following facts:

First. The postal receipts for the last fiscal year.
Second. The different Federal activities to be provided for.
Third. The number of employees for each Federal activity to be housed.
Fourth. The population according to the last Federal census and the preceding one.
Fifth. The estimated population at time of making the report.
Sixth. What important industries, if any, are located in or adjacent to the town or city.
Seventh. How many railroads.
Eighth. Whether county seat or not.
Ninth. Character of public and business buildings.
Tenth. What municipal improvements.
Eleventh. Present needs as to space and probable needs within 10 years.
Twelfth. Character of rented quarters occupied by the Government at time of making report.
Thirteenth. Amount of rent being paid annually in the town or city by the Government at time of making report.
Fourteenth. Distance of post office from union station or depot of railroad to which bulk of mail is brought at time of making report.
Fifteenth. Amount being paid annually by the Government for carriage of mail to and fro between depots and wharves and post office at time of making report.
Sixteenth. Any further fact or facts showing or tending to show advisability of providing for a Federal building at the place named in the bill.

That from and after the passage of this act no city or town in the United States where there are no Federal activities other than the post office shall be considered, either for the purchase of a site or for the construction of a Federal building, by the commissioner of public buildings or the bureau of public buildings or by any committee of Congress, unless it shall appear that the postal receipts for such city or town have amounted to at least $10,000 annually for three successive years: Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to cities or towns where sites for public buildings have been acquired or authorized.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: At the end of line 7, on page 54, add the following:

"Provided further, That the Bureau of Public Buildings in the construction work herein or hereafter authorized is hereby directed to give precedence to those authorizations most urgently needed by the Postal Service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman let me get through with this first? I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Amend, on page 61, line 3, by striking out all of line 3 and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "First. The postal receipts for the past three fiscal years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is to go at the end of the bill as a separate section.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert as a separate section the following: "No janitor shall be employed for any Federal building in which a post office is located where the postal receipts do not exceed $20,000 per annum unless a Federal court be located in such building."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma: Page 52, line 20, after the word "of," strike out "$7,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,000."

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury now receives a $5,000 salary per annum. Is that correct? I will ask the chairman of the committee. At any rate, that is the fact as I understand it. I ask the chairman of the committee is it not a fact that the Supervising Architect receives a $5,000 salary per annum?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think so.

Mr. MADDEN. He gets $6,000.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think he gets $6,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Five thousand dollars is the salary named in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All right; no matter what it is, he is not worth $3,000.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The committee probably considered this question, but it seems to me that this salary named here is really excessive. The assistant secretaries in the various departments receive but $5,000 per annum. Most of the commissioners receive but $4,000, and if we fix the salary of the head man here at $7,500 that will fix the standard for the salaries of all those under him. I think the general tendency of this Congress is to fix salaries too high. That is all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say this, that the amount of salary is a matter of judgment. The architects of this country make a great deal more money than that. You can not get a man who is a first-class man to take that place for $5,000 or $6,000. I question whether you would be able to get him for $7,500.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In a moment. The committee discussed fixing it at $10,000. For myself I would be perfectly willing to pay $20,000 a year to a good man who would go into that office and do the work that ought to be done. He can save his salary a dozen times over in the course of a year, because if we get the right man—and we have attempted here to get not only a good architect but a good business man—if we can get that kind of a combination the Government could well afford to pay him $50,000 a year and save these enormous fees that are paid out to outside architects who work upon these great buildings. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman will not be agreed to.

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. VARE. I want to ask the gentleman whether this does not eliminate entirely the question of fees?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, absolutely. He gets a salary and nothing else.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the chairman of the committee. My judgment is that a good architect should be paid $10,000 a year, and not $7,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think it is somewhat regrettable that a prolonged and rather vain discussion of the various items in the bill consumed so much time, and left the committee in such a condition of impatience of mind that we cannot have a discussion of this very important section of this bill. This section is not only very important, but in the main wise. But it has many provisions, a number of which it seems to me are questionable; and in just the moment that I shall take I want to call the attention of the committee, and particularly the chairman of the committee, to one or two features of the legislation.

The first paragraph of this section abolishes the Office of the Supervising Architect and establishes the bureau of public buildings. The next paragraph provides that after the commissioner of public buildings has been appointed he may continue under his jurisdiction the employees of the Supervising Architect's Office; but let me suggest to the chairman, in order that he may give the matter his attention before this legislation becomes a law, that as the matter now stands, if I correctly interpret the language, there would be a period of time between the time when the Office of the Supervising Architect is abolished and the new official is appointed, takes the oath of office and organizes his office, during which the force of the Supervising Architect's Office would be legislated out of employment, and there should be a brief amendment providing for the continuation of the employment of the force in the Supervising Architect's Office until such time as the new office is established and the force employed under the new plan. It seems to me that is rather important.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Has the gentleman prepared such an amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not prepared such an amendment, because I have not been certain until very recently as to the situation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the gentleman think they would continue anyhow without that express provision? Does not the gentleman think they would continue to perform their functions until the new commissioner took hold?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not; I am told that former proposed legislation along this same line did contain a provision under which this force was continued in office or continued in employment until they went under the supervision of the new official. This bill goes to another body, and will be considered there, and I am sure the chairman of the committee will have this matter in mind.

In the meantime I want to call attention to some language in the middle of the paragraph on page 60, providing for public buildings in small towns, the effect of the provision being that in such towns the Government shall build factory or block types of buildings, and expand and enlarge them as the needs of the Government increase. In my opinion that is exceedingly objectionable legislation. If we are to build public buildings we ought to build public buildings that we will be proud of. The Federal Government ought not to start on a policy of building cheap and flimsy buildings anywhere. If we build a factory or block type of building, they should only be built in places where the business of the Government is purely of a commercial character. The post-office business is not that sort of business. The post offices are built generally on the main street, and they should be of a character that will compare favorably with the best buildings in the town or the city. They ought not to be cheap or flimsy. The Government ought to build a good building that we can be proud of, or it ought not to build at all. I realize that at this late hour we can not secure consideration of an amendment, hence I will not offer one, but this paragraph ought to be amended as well as a number of paragraphs of this section. As matters now stand we must depend on the Senate to give this legislation proper attention.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 62, line 17, strike out the words "or authorized."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to what I regard as a very important matter. The chairman of the committee having charge of the bill stated that this last paragraph did not apply to the provisions contained in the bill. With all deference to the chairman and his ability to construe the law which he drew, I can not agree with him. I believe the provisions of the last paragraph apply to projects contained in the bill. I have not offered the amendment to do away with that construction, but rather to strengthen it, because I prefer to see that construction maintained. The last paragraph provides that "from and after the passage of this act" certain things shall be done. Let us see what effect this has upon the projects contained in the bill. This section provides, in the first instance, for the creation of a bureau of public buildings. After having provided for the creation of a bureau, it provides in this section that from and after the passage of this act no place shall be selected as a site for a post office unless the annual receipts amount to $10,000. That is as explicit as it can be. "From and after the passage of this act" means immediately on the passage of this act. That is the construction which ought to be put upon it and one which will be put upon it, and any officer who undertakes to put any other construction upon it will do it at his peril.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill is construed according to the plain meaning of the language of this last paragraph, there is no room for proper criticism upon it. Only towns with post-office receipts amounting to $10,000 are to have a post-office building, and I am not prepared to say that under no circumstances should one having receipts somewhat less be provided with a building. The average citizen of a country town can not come to Washington. He can not see these great buildings upon which money has been spent without stint for architectural display. He can not pass through the Congressional Library and see the beautiful paintings, its bronze statuary, and its wealth of decorations in marble and mosaic. He gets no benefit from the millions that have been spent to beautify the buildings in this and other great cities of the Nation.

He only knows the Government as an intangible something, and the only time he comes into contact with it is when he goes to his post office, a dingy, dirty, ill-kept building, where his wife and daughters are crowded and jammed for want of space in the waiting lobby, and where he often has to wait two hours for the distribution of his mail because of inadequate facilities for its distribution. In the large towns the citizen has his mail brought to his door. In the small towns he goes after it, and usually pays the Government annually as box rent—the box being as much for the convenience of the Government as his own—more than the box costs. He quite properly feels that he is not being treated fairly or justly under such conditions. It is no answer to say that the big cities furnish the larger portion of the post-office receipts. They do; but while this is paid in the first instance by the large business houses which do a business with the country at large, it is all charged up as a part of the running expenses, added to the price of the goods, and in the final instance always paid by the country consumer.

The cost of these buildings ought to be greatly reduced. I do not know where the fault is, but I do know that I have never seen a post-office building yet when an equally useful and far more ornamental building would not have been built by private parties for less than two-thirds its cost. This bill undertakes to put a stop to this waste in the future, and I hope it will.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] will put a stop to the waste in janitors' fees which has heretofore been prevailing, and thereby obviate one of the strongest objections to the bill. This bill is by far the best general public-buildings bill that has ever been presented to Congress. It restricts expenditures, will reduce the cost of building, and will permit those localities which do not have sufficient receipts at this time to obtain buildings when they have shown $10,000 post-office receipts for a period of three years. Its provisions will be misrepresented by a sensational press, but when completely understood it will receive no criticism except from those who want all of the money spent in the large cities and wish to deny to rural communities conveniences to which they are entitled.

It is said with reference to some of these projects that it would be cheaper to rent than build new buildings, even after the janitors' fees are limited. This may be true; but we do not construct these buildings entirely for profit. If we did, we never would build libraries, for they do not pay. We would seldom build a courthouse, for we could rent some old shed cheaper. Nor, applying the same principle, would we ever put any money into parks, which are a total loss from this standpoint; nor as individuals, even when possessed of ample means, would we construct anything for a house more than a mere shelter. Under this same theory the noble monument which we are erecting to Lincoln, and which is to cost several millions of dollars, is merely graft or pork on the part of this city.

It is said that in any event that this bill ought not to pass at this time on account of the condition of the Treasury. I admit that the condition of the Treasury is serious, but this issue is a false one. There is not a man on this floor that does not know that nothing will be spent on the projects in this bill for three years, except in the emergency cases in the big cities and buying sites to prevent an advance in price. Nothing whatever can possibly be spent in the next year, and what is spent after that in the next two years will be in urgent cases for the big cities. Four years ago I obtained the passage of a bill for the erection of a public building in a town of my district. The contract is not yet let, and it will be probably another year before much is paid out on it.

Mr. Chairman, even if a different construction should be placed on the language of this bill from that which is plainly the meaning of its words, and thereby some projects be authorized which at present have too small post-office receipts to be entitled thereto, they are all growing towns, and by the time the contracts are ready to be let they will have reached the limit which is certainly prescribed for the future, if not for the present. The amendment which I have offered would put beyond all question the application of the $10,000 limit to the projects in this bill. If it should be rejected and thereby an improper construction put upon the terms of the bill, the fault is not mine, and I do not feel that I am reuqired to vote against the bill for that reason. All but about $5,000,000 authorized goes to the large cities. One per cent of the amount carried by the bill would take care of every project in the bill where the receipts are less than $10,000 annually, and even those cases will probably reach that amount before construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRAMTQN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 7, after the word "establishments" strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "or to the Capitol Building, Senate Office Building, or the House Office Building."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is due to the fact that in the first two lines of page 54, especially line 5, it says "and the maintenance of all completed Federal buildings throughout the United States." The Capitol, the Senate Office Building, and the House Office Building are Federal buildings, and if so their care and maintenance will be given to this board.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not add the White House?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I will modify my amendment by adding the White House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman modifying the amendment?

There was no objection.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not want to detain the House, as it is evidently anxious and ready to vote. Anything I may say will not change a vote, and I am not going to make any effort to change a vote. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that you can not make types of building by law. It will be impossible to do it. Legislation that is here proposed will be futile. It will cost more money to build the foundation of a building in one place than it will to complete the whole building in another place. What is the use of talking about types? You can not divide the country into sections in which certain types of buildings will be employed. The material in one section of the country will cost four times as much as for the same building in another section of the country. If Bedford stone is specified to be used in a building in San Francisco, the cost of the freight alone will amount to more than the building will cost if material is used which is on the ground where it is produced.

So, here we are endeavoring by legislation to regulate a condition that can not be regulated. It seems to me absurd, and I think some one ought to go on record as saying that this is not possible to be obtained through the bill which is here proposed.

We are spending, if this money is all appropriated in this bill alone, $40,000,000, and we are creating a bureau that will have control over the expenditure of all the money in the future expended for public buildings. We are endeavoring by legislation to instruct the bureau that we are creating as to the type of building that will be erected in any given section of the Union. It can not be done. If you say the type is to be of a certain value or cost, that is one thing; but to build a certain type of building in one section of the country and the same type in another section of the country are two different propositions, because in the one case the same type may cost four times as much as in the other case. [Applause.]

So, why complicate the situation by placing upon the records of Congress a statute instructing those who are empowered to construct the buildings to do a thing which is impossible for them to do? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to move to strike out, for the sake of grammar, without taking any time, the word "which," in line 8, on page 53. I call this to the attention of the committee; if they do not care to do so, well and good.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 8, strike out the word "which."

Mr. CRAMTON. Also, in line 13, the same page, the word "to."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the additional amendment.

Page 53, line 13, strike out the word "to."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There is no objection to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill do pass. [Applause.]

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CLINE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18994 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws his point of no quorum and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. HULBERT, for three legislative days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. LOBECK, for a week, on account of illness.

To Mr. CONRY, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

LATE ADMIRAL GEORGE DEWEY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a minute.

Members will undoubtedly go home during the roll call, and I think we ought to have some understanding now under unanimous consent so that all Members will be informed in regard to the program for to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me to make one statement? I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that on account of the ceremonies in the Capitol to-morrow the trip to Monticello has been postponed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I understand——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the House that when they adjourn to-day they adjourn to meet at 10.45 to-morrow morning, in order to attend the ceremonies at 11 o'clock in the rotunda. After that I shall move to adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. MANN. So that Members may understand, I wish to say that my understanding is that the House as a House——

Mr. KITCHIN. Without taking a recess at all.

Mr. MANN (continuing). With the Speaker will march over to the rotunda, without tickets.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. So that Members will not have tickets, but they should be here.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I just had notice from one of my clerks that the tickets of admission to the building, even for Members, were at the post office.

Mr. KITCHIN. There will be no tickets to Members. The Members will go over in a body and return here after the ceremony.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Evidently what the gentleman refers to is that the Capitol is to be closed to-morrow, and nobody will be admitted except Members and those having tickets of admission. The employees of the House and others who are employed in the Capitol are furnished tickets of admission by the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. LANGLEY. Are there no tickets for other employees?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] as to the distribution of these tickets. What about the families of Members?

Mr. KITCHIN. No tickets have been issued to Members.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I mean, to outside people—the families of Members.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The only persons who will attend the funeral, I understand, are those who have been invited to the rotunda, and those invited include the two Houses of Congress, the Diplomatic Corps, naval officers, and certain friends and relatives of the deceased. I understand there are no provisions for any public admissions.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is right.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that all Members understand that owing to the limited space in the rotunda Members will not have tickets to distribute to individuals. Members themselves will not require tickets. I think the tickets referred to are probably automobile tickets to get into the grounds, or something of that kind.

Mr. KITCHIN. And for the employees of the Capitol here.

Mr. MANN. And for the employees.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is not the understanding that the Members of the House will have to have tickets to the Capitol.

Mr. MANN. The Members of the House do not.

The SPEAKER. If the gentlemen will permit, the Speaker will state what a member of the House committee told him after investigation and inquiry. He said the space was so limited that they set aside a sufficient number of seats for the House Members and for the Members of the Senate. They gave so many tickets to the President. They assigned so many of them to Mrs. Dewey, and she sent back word she wanted some more, and they gave her the others. They set aside 150 places for naval officers, and they have arranged for the Cabinet, and that exhausts the seating capacity. Your people might get in and stand around the wall. The Sergeant at Arms got up a ticket to give to the employees of the House, so that they could get into the building. The Members of Congress do not have to have any tickets in order to get into the Capitol.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.45 a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.45 a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of this public-buildings bill—H. R. 18994—will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 234, nays 92, answered "present" 2, not voting 106, as follows:

By Mr. STAFFORD: Petition of residents of the fifth district of Wisconsin, protesting against District and national prohibition and mail-exclusion bills; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: Memorial of Association of the American Agricultural College to Congress, protesting against the amendment proposed in Senate bill 4874, known as the land-grant bill; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. TAGUE: Petition of sundry railroad employees, opposing House bill 19730; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. WASON: Petition of J. P. Conway, of Plymouth, and 24 other New Hampshire employees in the maintenance-of-way department of American railways, favoring an eight-hour-day law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Frank Herbert, of Rumney, and 12 other New Hampshire employees in the maintenance-of-way department of American railways, favoring an eight-hour-day law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of J. H. Gale, of Warren, and 17 other New Hampshire employees in the maintenance-of-way department of American railways, favoring an eight-hour-day law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 20, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee at this hour impressed with the solemn thought of death. A prince of Israel has fallen. We are reminded of the ever recurring lesson of Thy Divine providence that in the last issue it is character that wins the glory of life. We pause in the midst of the busy activities of our national life to pay tribute of praise and give some recognition of the fame of this great hero of the sea. We pray for those upon whom his mantle of greatness shall fall, that the high ideals of our Navy, with its spirit of devotion and loyalty and patriotism, may be preserved as a defense of our national honor and the pledge of our national greatness. We pray that as we study the lives of those whom Thou dost bring into the public gaze through deeds of valor we may be enabled to emulate their example and perpetuate among us those high ideals of civil life that have characterized our heroes of the past.

We ask the blessing of God upon our Nation, upon all in authority, upon those who are in places of influence and power, that their outward lives may conform to the dictates of conscience, inspired by the truth of God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The Vice PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

LABOR TROUBLES AT EVERETT, WASH.

Mr. JONES. I present resolutions of the Port Commission and of the Central Labor Council of Seattle, Wash., favoring an investigation of the recent industrial troubles at that place.

Mr. President, I desire to state that early in November a very unfortunate occurrence took place in Everett, Wash., resulting in the loss of several lives and the shooting of several persons on account of labor troubles and controversies. I have given it a great deal of study and thought and concluded that there has not been sufficient data presented to warrant a congressional investigation. The matter is also pending in the courts, and I did not desire to do anything that might prejudice one side or the other. So I take this opportunity of making this statement and simply presenting the resolutions. I ask that they may be properly filed and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. I suppose that is the proper committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH CHINA.

Mr. JONES presented a petition of the Port Commission of Seattle, Washington, praying for an investigation into the commercial trade opportunities in China and the establishment of trade relations with that country, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ADDRESS BY MISS SUSANNA COCROFT.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask consent to have published in the RECORD a very valuable address on the Nation's health delivered before the National Conservation Congress last year by Miss Susanna Cocroft, of Chicago, a well-known student of health conditions in the United States. The address relates to very striking and interesting statistics which I believe would be valuable.

Mr. JONES. What is it about?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is an address on public health by Miss Susanna Cocroft delivered before the Conservation Congress. It is a very valuable address.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator if he will not consent to have it made a public document instead of printing it in the RECORD. The RECORD really ought to be the record of what is said actually in the Senate rather than of outside matters.

Mr. RANSDELL. That will be satisfactory, Mr. President.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is not here. He has insisted that all such matters should be referred to the Committee on Printing. I suggest that that had better be done.

Mr. RANSDELL. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The address will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

WATER POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. HUSTING submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DESECRATION OF THE AMERICAN FLAG.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there is a little bill which I should like to call up by unanimous consent. It is the bill (H. R. 14822) to prevent and punish the desecration, mutilation, or improper use, within the District of Columbia, of the flag of the United States of America.

I may state as a reason for making the request at this time that there are many patriotic organizations in the District which have been insisting upon the passage of the bill. It will take only about two minutes to pass it. No amendment to it has been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which it was referred. If there is no objection, I should like to have it disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the bill, let me inquire?

Mr. POMERENE. It is a bill providing against the desecration of the flag in the District. I ask unanimous consent that it be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the bill be read first, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter any person who, within the District of Columbia, in any manner, for exhibition or display, shall place or cause to be placed any word, figure, mark, picture, design, drawing, or any advertisement of any nature upon any flag, standard, colors or ensign of the United States of America; or shall expose or cause to be exposed to public view any such flag, standard, colors or ensign upon which shall have been printed, painted or otherwise placed, or to which shall be attached, appended, affixed or annexed any word, figure, mark, picture, design or drawing, or any advertisement of any nature; or who, within the District of Columbia, shall manufacture, sell, expose for sale or to public view or give away or have in possession for sale or to be given away or for use for any purpose, any article or substance being an article of merchandise, or a receptacle for merchandise or article or thing for carrying or transporting merchandise, upon which shall have been printed, painted, attached or otherwise placed a representation of any such flag, standard, colors or ensign, to advertise, call attention to, decorate, mark or distinguish the article or substance on which so placed; or who, within the District of Columbia, shall publicly mutilate, deface, defile or defy, trample upon or cast contempt, either by word or act, upon any such flag, standard, colors or ensign, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not more than thirty days, or both, in the discretion of the court. The words "flag, standard, colors, or ensign," as used herein, shall include any flag, standard, colors, ensign or any picture or representation of either, or of any part or parts of either, made of any substance or represented on any substance, of any size evidently purporting to be either of said flag, standard, colors or ensign of the United States of America or a picture or a representation of either, upon which shall be shown the colors, the stars and the stripes, in any number of either thereof, or of any part or parts of either, by which the average person seeing the same without deliberation may believe the same to represent the flag, colors, standard or ensign of the United States of America.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio why the measure is limited to the District of Columbia?

Mr. POMERENE. As the Senator perhaps is aware, there is an association organized for the protection of the flag, and it is said that each of the States has legislated upon this subject. It was at their suggestion that the bill was prepared in this way, limiting it to the District. I personally would have no objection to making it apply to the entire United States, save and except for the fact that nearly all the States, I think I may say all the States, have legislation upon the subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Have the various States laws in identical terms with this measure?

Mr. POMERENE. Not in identically the same terms.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to be a pretty comprehensive measure; it covers a great many things; and I would imagine that the laws of the various States would differ quite materially with reference to the particulars.

Mr. POMERENE. They do differ slightly, but it was thought that there was no suitable legislation here in the District. The terms of this proposed law are very comprehensive. I do not think there is any objection to it on that score.

I can see a reason for the objection which the Senator urges, that it should apply to the United States as a whole, but if that should be regarded as necessary, further legislation can be brought in at a later day. I really think it is necessary here in the District.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is a little difficult to follow the terms of a bill of this kind from the reading at the desk, and I have not a copy of the bill before me. Very much of it everyone of course agrees to. However, I am not at all sure but that it goes a little too far. The object of the legislation, of course, is to compel respect for the flag and prevent an insult to or desecration of it and not to prevent the use of it in a manner which does not involve anything of that sort.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator speak a little louder? I did not catch his remarks fully.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him a question. Suppose a steamship company plying between the United States and Argentina should see fit to put upon its folders or otherwise an interwoven American and Argentine flag and really use that as their emblem, showing the relation between the two countries, is it not made a crime to print or sell anything of that kind? Or if I want to order a card——

Mr. POMERENE. This applies only to the District.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am speaking of the District of Columbia. Suppose they are being printed here. It seems to me the bill goes too far and would punish a very legitimate use of the American flag. There are many instances in which the American flag might well be placed upon a card showing a respect for it and why make it a criminal offense to display it in any way on anything that happens to be sold? It seems to me that the bill ought to go over until we can read it carefully and understand it more thoroughly, and I will object to its present consideration.

Mr. POMERENE. I will not insist, if there is objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

FUNERAL OF ADMIRAL DEWEY.

The hour of 10 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m. having arrived,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will proceed to the rotunda of the Capitol.

The Senate, preceded by the Sergeant at Arms and headed by the Vice President and Secretary, proceeded to the rotunda of the Capitol to attend the services at the funeral of Admiral Dewey.

At 11 o'clock and 32 minutes a. m. the Senate returned to its Chamber and the Vice President resumed the chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 11 o'clock and 35 minutes a. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 22, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 20, 1917.

The House met at 10 o'clock and 45 minutes a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit Our Heavenly Father, for that quality resident in the soul of man which pours itself out in admiration, praise, and gratitude for the man who conscientiously fulfills his duty, whether in the private walks of life or in a public service for his country. We thank Thee that our Nation is to-day pouring out its gratitude through a rainbow of tears for our departed hero. And we pray that his life and splendid achievements may be an inspiration to us and those who shall come after us, to follow his illustrious example, that departing we may leave the world our debtor, through Him who taught us the glory of a noble life; amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ROBERT E. LEE.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the speech delivered yesterday by my colleague, Hon. CHARLES M. STEDMAN, on the anniversary of the birth of Gen. Robert E. Lee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered yesterday by his colleague, Maj. STEDMAN, on the life and character of Gen. Robert E. Lee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FUNERAL OF ADMIRAL DEWEY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the Senate is waiting for the House to go to the Rotunda to attend the funeral of Admiral Dewey. I suggest that the House, attended by the Sergeant at Arms, now proceed to the Rotunda.

The SPEAKER. The Members of the House in a body will proceed to the Rotunda.

At 10 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m. the House of Representatives, preceded by the Speaker and the Sergeant at Arms, proceeded to the Rotunda, where was held the funeral of George Dewey, Admiral of the Navy.

At 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m. the Members of the House of Representatives returned to the Hall, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. DAVENPORT, for 10 days, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 32 minutes a. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, January 22, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. ADAIR: A bill (H. R. 20345) granting a pension to Malissa Giles Richards; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 20346) granting a pension to Albert Helms; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20347) granting a pension to Frank Logsdon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MOORES of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 20348) granting an increase of pension to Mary Pickens; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STEELE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 20349) granting an increase of pension to Charles J. Somers; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas: A bill (H. R. 20350) granting an increase of pension to Ernest J. Patton; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. FULLER: Petition of Dr. F. A. Eastman and others, of Rockford, Ill., protesting against increase of postal rates on second-class matter; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. HAMLIN: Papers to accompany H. R. 19911, for relief of Alphonso G. Anderson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast made our human responsibility commensurate with the gifts of Thy providence and grace. Thou hast unlocked the treasure house of earth and there stand about us ministers and messengers to do our bidding. Too often we have turned these forces of nature that Thou hast put at our command into instruments of human destruction. Too often Thy winged messengers have carried evil deeds to regions beyond.

We confess before Thee our national sins, and we pray Thee to guide us and guard us and bring us back into harmony with Thy will. May the time speedily come when we shall beat our spears into pruning hooks and our swords into plowshares. Then the peace and glory of God shall be upon this and every land. Then the time shall come when the knowledge and glory of God shall fill the whole world. We ask for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Secretary read the communication, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 21, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: There is a communication concerning the foreign relations of the country which I think it my duty to make to the Senate and which I should very much like to make in person. I would be very much obliged if I might be afforded an opportunity to do so to-morrow, the 22d, if it can be arranged without inconvenience to the Senate.

I know of no way other than this informal way in which to convey this wish to the Senators. I have spoken to Senator STONE, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, about it, and have asked him to confer with you.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield? This is an important question and I think we ought to have a quorum. Some question may arise afterwards and we would save time by getting a quorum here.

Mr. STONE. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	Norris	Smoot
Beckham	Hollis	Overman	Sterling
Brady	Husting	Page	Stone
Brandegee	James	Pittman	Sutherland
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Poindexter	Thomas
Catron	Jones	Ransdell	Thompson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Reed	Townsend
Clark	Kern	Robinson	Vardaman
Culberson	La Follette	Saulsbury	Warren
Cummins	Lodge	Shafroth	Weeks
Dillingham	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Works
Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent an account of sickness. I wish this announcement to stand for the day. My colleague is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. On all votes he is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there were so many Senators absent when the communication from the President was read, I ask that it may again be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary again read the communication.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations whether, this being a matter touching our foreign relations, we are to be addressed by the President in executive session or in open session?

Mr. STONE. It is not, as I understand the communication, a matter that needs to be presented in executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the Senator from Missouri has accurate knowledge on that question and, of course, I do not raise any objection, but——

Mr. STONE. The inquiry is a very proper one.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have been so careful, and it has been suggested to us that we ought to be very careful, about discussing matters of our foreign relations in open session. I wondered whether there was to be a departure from that custom.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I move that the Chair appoint a committee of five Senators to inform the President that the Senate will be pleased to receive him at 1 o'clock post meridian to-day, and that the same committee receive him on his arrival at the Capitol and escort him to the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed as the committee Mr. KERN, Mr. STONE, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. KENYON.

The VICE PRESIDENT subsequently said: The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has requested to be excused from service on the committee to wait on the President of the United States and to escort him to the Senate Chamber. The Chair appoints the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] in the place of the Senator from Indiana.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] also asks to be excused, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] in his place.

TARGET PRACTICE IN THE NAVY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 11th instant, the number of scores made on the 30 by 90 foot screen by the vessels of the Atlantic Fleet in the division day and individual battle practices in the seasons of 1914, 1915, and 1916, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 18994) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of certain public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for certain public buildings; to abolish the Office of Supervising Architect of the Treasury and to create and organize in the Treasury Department a bureau of public buildings and define its duties, powers, and jurisdiction; to create and establish the office of commissioner of public buildings; to fix the salary and prescribe the duties and powers of the said commissioner of public buildings; to create a board of estimates and prescribe its duties and powers; to provide for the standardization of certain classes of public buildings, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Portland, Me., praying for the passage of the so-called Webb bill relating to foreign trade, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Augusta and Auburn, in the State of Maine, and of sundry citizens of Boston, Mass., praying for an increase of pension for survivors of the Civil War under certain regulations, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Association of Fully Disabled Union Veterans of Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for an increase of pension to those who lost limbs during the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Crocker Post, No. 12, Grand Army of the Republic, of Des Moines, Iowa, praying for the repeal of the rules and regulations relating to the granting of pensions, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STONE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of West Plains, Mo., remonstrating against any change in postal rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina presented petitions of sundry citizens of South Carolina, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Taunton, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to exempt the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad from the provisions of the Panama Canal act prohibiting the operation of steamship lines by railroads in certain cases, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maryland, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of Typographical Union No. 231, of San Jose, Cal., remonstrating against a change in second-class postal rates, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

DELAWARE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 7748) to authorize the United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Co., and such other corporation or individuals as may be associated with it, to construct a bridge across the portion of the Delaware River between the mainland of the county of Camden and State of New Jersey, and Petty Island in said county and State, and I submit a report (No. 959) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments of the committee were, on page 1, line 10, after the word "River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," and, on page 2, line 1, after the word "of," to strike out the words "Bridges over navigable waters" and insert "the act entitled 'An act to regulate he construction of bridges over navigable waters,'" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Co., a corporation created and organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and such other corporation or individuals, if any, as shall be associated with said company for the purpose, their successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the intervening portion of the Delaware River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from the mainland of Camden County, in the State of New Jersey, to Petty Island, in said county and State, in accordance with the provisions of "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and that said bridge may be either for railroad purposes alone, or in part for railroad and in part for highway purposes, at the option of said United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Co.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on Friday last I introduced a bill (S. 7936) authorizing the Secretary of War to establish on the military reservation on the arsenal grounds, St. Louis, Mo., a general supply depot, which, on my own suggestion, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I am informed by those better advised than I am that the reference was a mistake and that the bill should have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee no Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 7937) granting an increase of pension to Ira S. Bier (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Maine:

A bill (S. 7945) to investigate the condition of Indians living in Louisiana; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 7946) for the relief of Albert Tate; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 7947) granting a pension to James Nethers; and

A bill (S. 7948) granting an increase of pension to Jules Toffier; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HUSTING:

A bill (S. 7949) to provide for the erection of an addition to the Federal Building in the city of Janesville, county of Rock, and State of Wisconsin; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 7950) granting an increase of pension to John F. Anderson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 7951) granting a pension to Edward Fraher and Catherine Fraher, minor children of Joseph M. Fraher (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 7952) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 7953) granting an increase of pension to Tulula V. M. Bortsfield (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 7954) granting an increase of pension to John T. Quinby (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 7955) granting an increase of pension to Henry Barber (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 7956) granting a pension to Lydia M. Smith (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 7957) granting a pension to Allen N. Bundy (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 7958) granting a pension to Daniel Donohoe (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 7959) granting an increase of pension to Albert P. Ramsey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 7960) granting an increase of pension to Mitchell Larock (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COLT:

A bill (S. 7961) granting a pension to James W. McKay (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 7962) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for the selection of lands for educational purposes in lieu of those appropriated; to the Committee on Public Lands.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. REED submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1695) to provide for the military and naval training of the citizen forces of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ADJUDICATION OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6918) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2215) to provide divisions of mental hygiene and rural sanitation in the United States Public Health Service, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT FOR PORTO RICO.

Mr. BROUSSARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9533) to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. STERLING submitted an amendment providing that hereafter every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and without extra charge therefor the persons in charge of the mails, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 19410), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOWNSEND submitted an amendment providing in the clause relative to the employment on holidays of special clerks in first and second class post offices being allowed compensatory time on one of the 30 days next following the holiday on which they perform such service other employees shall be included, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 19410), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STONE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain agricultural and horticultural experimental stations in the Central West, to be located in the principal grape growing States of Missouri, Ohio, Arkansas, and Michigan, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 19359), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for biophysical investigations under the Bureau of Plant Industry, Agricultural Department, from $32,500 to $35,500, of which amount $3,000 is to be used for the purpose of investigating root-rot disease of fruit trees, alfalfa, and cotton in the Salt River and Yuma Valleys, in the State of Arizona, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 19359), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the enlargement of the cottonseed breeding station at Greenville, Tex., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 19359), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

THE ST. JOHN RIVER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 325), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate the report of the International Commission pertaining to the St. John River.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in accordance with Rule XL of the Senate Rules, I hereby give notice that on tomorrow I will propose that paragraph 3, of Rule XXXVIII, of the Rules of the Senate, be amended so that it shall read as follows:

3. All proceedings of the Senate when acting upon nominations shall be in open executive session, except when the Senate by a majority vote shall otherwise decide. Upon a motion for a secret executive session upon any nomination, each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only. If the Senate decides that any nomination should be considered in secret session, then all information communicated to or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon such nomination concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon such nomination, shall be kept secret. If in any case charges shall be made against a person nominated, the committee may in its discretion notify such nominee thereof, but the name of the person making such charges shall not be disclosed. The fact that a nomination has been made, or that it has been confirmed or rejected, shall not be regarded as a secret.

REPORT ON SUBMARINE BATTERIES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, on January 2 a report was received from the Secretary of the Navy in reply to a resolution which I offered as to the publication of a report concerning the blowing up of some of our submarines, and it was ordered printed (S. Doc. No. 651) and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I understand that the Secretary of the Navy, in his testimony before the Committee on Naval Affairs, has given the information I sought to obtain. I think it would be a useless expense to print the matter which the Secretary has sent to the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the reference and the order to print. I do this simply to save the Government the expense.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, I ask that the matter be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs without printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

GOVERNMENT EXHIBIT IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 182, relative to a Government exhibit in the District of Columbia, and for which I asked consideration the other day. I feel that the joint resolution can be amended in such terms as will relieve it of any possible objection. It provides for an exhibit in the District of Columbia covering the time between February 26 and March 4, during the inaugural proceedings. The purpose is both laudable and commendable, and I feel that no Senator will now object to the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. The original joint resolution of the Senator from New Jersey is now on the calendar, and he asks unanimous consent for its present consideration?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; I have asked for the present consideration of the joint resolution heretofore introduced by me, and, if that request is granted, then I shall offer some amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. There can be no objection to the amendments which the Senator has, and I hope unanimous consent will be granted for the consideration and passage of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think the amendments which the Senator from New Jersey intends to propose to the joint resolution should be first read before unanimous consent is given for its consideration.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 3, after the word "That," it is proposed to strike out "Congress approves the suggestion of the Federation of Citizens' Associations, representing a majority of the citizens' associations of the District of Columbia, that it extend, on behalf of the residents of the District of Columbia, an invitation to the people of the United States to visit Washington during the week of February 26 to March 4, 1917, in order that they may become better acquainted with the Capital of the Nation and the operations of the Federal Government, and"; on page 2, line 2, after the word "establishments," to insert "in Washington"; and, in the same line, after the word "exhibit," to insert "from February 26 to March 10, 1917," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That authority is hereby granted to the executive departments and various Government establishments in Washington to exhibit from February 26 to March 10, 1917, such activities and methods of transacting business as can be done without detriment to the public service, with the object of presenting an educational symposium that will be of practical benefit to the people of the country.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I will say that I asked unanimous consent for the passage of this resolution as proposed to be amended, because it provides for the appropriation of no money. The various Government departments in this city, the clerks, and the citizens are most zealous in their efforts, and this will facilitate the work. They very earnestly desire that the joint resolution may be passed, and I trust that it may now be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from New Jersey does not ask that the joint resolution shall be passed this morning, does he?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes. I should like to have the joint resolution immediately considered and passed, owing to the fact that the time for carrying it into effect is exceedingly short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], which have been read.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing an exhibition of the various activities of the Government service."

RETIREMENT OF FEDERAL JUDGES.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have a brief argument prepared by Judge Walter Evans, of the district court of Kentucky, upon Senate bill 706, with reference to the constitutional features of that proposed legislation, which I think is exceedingly valuable. I ask that it may be printed as a Senate document. I understand that the Printing Committee have some sort of an understanding that all such communications must be referred to that committee. I wish that it might be waived in this instance, because this is a bill which is pending before the House, and I should like very much to have the matter printed, so that it may be available while the bill is under consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that I would much prefer to have it go to the committee. The committee can act upon it within the next day at least.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following act and joint resolutions:

On January 18, 1917:

S. 6864. An act providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of one year from January 1, 1917.

On January 19, 1917:

S. J. Res. 186. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River; and

S. J. Res. 194. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur March 1, 1917, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 18994. An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of certain public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for certain public buildings; to abolish the Office of Supervising Architect of the Treasury and to create and organize in the Treasury Department a bureau of public buildings and define its duties, powers, and jurisdiction; to create and establish the office of commissioner of public buildings; to fix the salary and prescribe the duties and powers of the said commissioner of public buildings; to create a board of estimates and prescribe its duties and powers; to provide for the standardization of certain classes of public buildings, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? If there be none, morning business is closed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the committee amendment on page 143, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 143 the Committee on Appropriations reported to strike out lines 1, 2, and 3, as follows:

To investigate and report upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially investigate the questions of infant mortality, $72,120.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, on Friday, when the appropriation for the Children's Bureau was under discussion, I called attention to the work that had been done heretofore in the Labor Department—the Bureau of Labor it was then, but now the Department of Labor—in gathering together information with respect to the condition of the children of the country. I was a little bit confused in my own mind at that time as to the second organization that had been doing work of that kind—one of them public in its nature and the other a private organization that, I think, is supported by charity. I want now to call attention to the reports that were made by this Labor Bureau. Those reports consist of 19 volumes, and go into the minutest details of the question of the condition of women and children as laborers. As showing the nature of the work that is to be done, I call attention to a letter written by Mr. Nagel, then Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting this report. He says:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington June 14, 1910.

HON. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In partial compliance with the Senate resolution of May 25, 1910, I beg to transmit herewith a report showing the results of the investigation into the condition of woman and child wage earners in the cotton textile industry in the United States.

This report has just been completed, and is the first section available for transmission of the larger report on the investigation carried on in accordance with the act of Congress approved January 29, 1907, which provided "That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate and report on the industrial, social, moral, educational, and physical condition of woman and child workers in the United States wherever employed, with special reference to their age, hours of labor, term of employment, health, illiteracy, sanitary and other conditions surrounding their occupation, and the means employed for the protection of their health, person, and morals."

A separate section, dealing with certain health conditions of cotton-mill operatives, together with the remaining sections of the general report, are being completed as rapidly as possible, and will each be transmitted at the earliest practicable moment.

Respectfully, CHARLES NAGEL,
Secretary.

This volume of the report is confined to "Condition of woman and child wage earners in the United States in the cotton-textile industry." It contains 1,044 pages of closely printed matter. The entire series when completed constituted 19 volumes, I assume, of similar or equal size. So that we have about 19,000 pages of printed matter giving the facts in detail and data relating to the important subject involved in the investigation. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] inquires the date of this report. It was transmitted to Congress June 14, 1910.

So that we have a very careful investigation of this subject so far as it relates to women and children engaged in labor. It does not extend necessarily to the babies who were too young to perform labor, but it practically covers all of the questions that would affect the condition and interest of little children as well as those who were old enough to work.

Mr. President, I had occasion to look into the question so far as it relates to the District of Columbia as a member of a joint committee of the two Houses that was appointed for the purpose of investigating the relations between the District of Columbia and the National Government. At that time I called upon the head of the health service here in the District to give me his views on the subject, and had a very interesting report from him that I called for individually in the preparation of a report that I was making at the time covering some of the things that I thought needed correction in the District of Columbia. Amongst other things, he furnished me with a table showing the population, deaths, and death rate in the District of Columbia by race and by calendar years from 1861 to 1914, inclusive. This showed a very careful investigation of these particular matters and it effected precisely what it is intended to be covered by this appropriation. I ask, without reading it, to include this table as part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. WORKS. Then in that same report was this statement with respect to the prevention of infant mortality:

PREVENTION OF INFANT MORTALITY.

Next to the prevention of tuberculosis the prevention of infant mortality has appealed to the popular mind and has been supported by private philanthropy. Up to the limit of its resources this has been done in this District. But the number of wealthy persons in the District who are able to support such a movement is small, and the number of those who are both able and willing to do so is even less.

The establishment of such infant-welfare stations as may be necessary to safeguard the health of the babies of the community would seem to be just as much a function of the Government as is any other action toward the conservation and promotion of health. What has been done by private philanthropy in this city is only the beginning of what should be done toward seeing that babies are well born and well cared for. These results are to be accomplished not so much by charity as by education, and to effect such education the infant-welfare station is but an incident. If the justification be needed for action by the District government to save the babes, it can be found in the fact that the Government of the United States has deemed it a proper exercise of its powers to establish the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor for the protection of the children of the Nation, even though the authority and power, with respect to the children, of the Nation generally is small as compared with the authority and power of the Government with respect to the children in this District.

The following statement shows the diminution that has occurred in the District since 1895, and this may be accepted as an indication of what may be accomplished in the future if a movement toward that end be properly organized and supported.

Then follows another table, showing the reduction in the death rate of children, which I also ask to include in my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Showing deaths and death rates of infants under 1 year of age in the District of Columbia, by race and by years, from 1896 to 1914, inclusive.

[NOTE.—Birth returns prior to 1906 were too incomplete to afford a safe basis for the computation of death rates, at least for purposes of comparison.]

[1] Annual average for 5-year period.

Mr. WORKS. In the prosecution of my portion of the work on that committee I prepared a somewhat lengthy report covering a number of subjects, one of them relating to the condition of what I call the "slums" of Washington, but which are generally more politely called the inhabited alleys and closed courts. I am not going to take up time in reading any portion of it or in commenting upon it, as I have done that once before in support of an appropriation that I asked for for that purpose, but I ask that it may be printed in my remarks also.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE SLUMS.

The American people want their Capital to be clean, decent, respectable, and healthful as well as beautiful on the outside. It has fallen far below this standard under a system of government where Congress can shift its responsibility onto the District of Columbia, a spineless and irresponsible municipal body. Under this system the slums, the red-light district, and saloons, and unwholesome and insanitary conditions have been allowed to flourish. Crime, vice, corruption, and death have devastated portions of the city that could and should have been protected from such conditions. From time to time feeble and ineffectual efforts have been made through inadequate laws to remedy these evils. The better class of people in the District have done the best they could with the insufficient weapons provided them by Congress to ameliorate the conditions and protect the poor people who suffer from them the most, but to a discouraging degree it has been a hopeless task. It is not wholly the fault of the people of the District that these conditions continue down to the present day. Neither is it the fault of the District officers. The chief reason for it is that Congress has failed to enact the laws and appropriate the money necessary to abate these crying evils, though often urged to do so.

In his message to the Fifty-ninth Congress President Roosevelt said:

"The National Government has control of the District of Columbia and should see to it that the city of Washington is made a model city in all respects, both as regards parks, public playgrounds, proper regulation of the system of housing, so as to do away with the evils of alley tenements, a proper system of education, a proper system of dealing with truancy and juvenile offenders, a proper handling of the charitable work of the District. Moreover, there should be proper factory laws to prevent all abuses in the employment of women and children in the District."

Pursuant to this recommendation the President appointed James Bronson Reynolds, of New York, to investigate conditions in the District and report to him with such recommendations as suggested themselves to him. In his letter asking Mr. Reynolds to act as adviser in the matter, he said:

"I wish your investigation to terminate in definite, practical recommendations to me with reference to the city's present needs and most notable defects, measured by the highest standards of good administration in this country and elsewhere."

I shall call attention to Mr. Reynolds's report and recommendations a little later. President Taft, dealing with this subject in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, has this to say:

"Fair as Washington seems, with her beautiful streets and shade trees, and free, as the expanse of territory which she occupies would seem to make her, from slums and insanitary congestion of population, there are centers in the interior of squares where the very poor, and the criminal classes as well, huddle together in filth and noisome surroundings, and it is of primary importance that these nuclei of disease and suffering and vice should be removed and that there should be substituted for them small parks as breathing spaces and model tenements, having sufficient air space and meeting other hygienic requirements. The estimate for the reform of Willow Tree Alley, the worst of these places in the city, is the beginning of a movement that ought to attract the earnest attention and support of Congress, for Congress can not escape its responsibility for the existence of these human pestholes."

In pursuance of recommendations made by Mr. Reynolds, President Roosevelt appointed a commission of 15 of the leading citizens of Washington to deal with the subject.

That commission made a full and exhaustive report of conditions with its recommendations. This report first quoted from Mr. Reynolds's report as follows:

"The report of Mr. James Bronson Reynolds, referred to in the President's letter as the basis of his action, is as follows:

"'REPORT OF THE HOUSING OF THE POOR IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ESPECIALLY IN RELATION TO INSIDE TENEMENTS.

"'As you directed me to give particular attention to the housing problem, I visited and examined between 350 and 400 tenements, shacks, and small houses in various sections of Washington and Georgetown and inspected numerous alleys. I talked with their occupants and conferred with many citizens of the District, both white and colored, including representatives of trade-unions, to obtain their views regarding housing conditions.

"'In my investigation I found three distinct problems—that of small houses, that of alley shacks and alley houses, and that of inside alleys. * * *

"'I found nearly all the alley wooden shacks and small brick houses that I visited in a wretched condition. The wooden shacks, as a rule, might properly be condemned on structural grounds. Their yards were apparently storage places for refuse and filth; their water supply inadequate and badly placed, and the privies frequently only open boxes and in many instances without covers, although the latter are required by the health ordinance. I am glad to state that during the past year many of these box privies have been removed.

"'I had conversation with the dwellers in these inside shacks, and the comments of many may be fairly summarized in the pathetic remark of an old colored woman who exclaimed, with reference to her neglected, filthy yard and privy: "Why, my old marsa wouldn't ha' kep' his horses stabled in such a place."

"'No argument is needed to show that such ill-conditioned hovels are culture beds of disease, the germs of which may be carried far and wide by the flies which feed on the rotting garbage and excreta. Their number should be promptly ascertained and immediate steps taken for their complete elimination, and buildings constructed in their places should have proper sanitary appurtenances and should open either upon a highway or small street. * * *

"'A particularly undesirable and menacing feature of the poor quarters of Washington is the inside alleys. These alleys are centers of disorder and crime, and they make possible the continuance of small communities uncontrolled by ordinary police inspection and unaffected by public observation and criticism. In my opinion all inside alleys, with the exception of service alleys, should be abolished, and a definite scheme for the accomplishment of this object should be adopted. * * *

"'A law passed by the Congress in 1906 appropriated $50,000 for the expense of condemnation proceedings in the substitution of minor streets for alleys, but a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has interposed fresh difficulties by declaring unconstitutional the assumption of the law that the entire cost of opening small streets as substitutes for alleys should be assessed upon the adjacent property owners. I am not prepared to make any specific recommendations to meet this new difficulty, but to urge that it be not allowed to prevent the abolition of inside alleys.'"

The commission then proceeded to report the result of its own investigations, make recommendations, and point out the obstacles that prevented effective work, including reports of its subcommittees. From this long and exhaustive report I extract the following:

"A SERIOUS OBSTACLE TO THE CONVERSION OF ALLEYS INTO STREETS.

"The law passed July 22, 1892, and amended on August 24, 1894, prohibited the erection of dwellings in alleys less than 30 feet wide, and imposed restrictions which hindered the building of any more alley houses. It also provided for the conversion of alleys into minor streets, but nothing of importance seems to have been done under this law until the committee on improvement of housing conditions took the matter up a year or more ago with a demand that the change be made in certain typical alleys. This led the commissioners to appoint a committee of District officials to advise them as to the opening of minor streets, and cases were taken up as rapidly as they could be properly handled until, up to the present time, the opening of 12 such streets has been recommended. Two of these have been confirmed by the courts and three other cases are pending in court. The commissioners are proceeding as rapidly as possible in the other cases, but the conflict with private interests led to litigation and a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States on March 11 last, which declared it illegal to assess all the damages on certain property, as the law provides, unless it is found to be benefited to that extent. Although the commissioners are continuing to prepare and present cases they can not, under the law, approve the verdict in any case unless the benefits as assessed equal the damages and expenses. * * *

"Mr. Thompson, in his Housing Handbook, says of private enterprise:

"'It has been assumed by thousands who ought to have known better that private enterprise, unstimulated, unregulated, unassisted, undirected, has hopelessly failed. It has left us face to face with a very deficient supply; it has given us the old slums; it often has given us only acres and acres of new slums in the suburbs, jerry-built "brick boxes with slate lids" dumped down on dust heaps and put up mainly with the object of getting a quick profit in the few years which will elapse before they degenerate into slum dwellings almost as bad as the old ones in our midst. Where the new houses are well built and on good sites they are of an unsuitable type, and the rents are so unreasonably high as to be beyond the means of one family, so they have to be sublet to other families, and thus by overcrowding, with the increased wear and tear following in its train, they rapidly deteriorate and leave the housing of the mass of the people as bad in many respects as it was before. The product of private enterprise, then, is insufficient in quantity and inferior in quality. * * *'

"In the report of the health officer for 1875 it was noted that during the year 699 houses were reported as unfit for human habitation and 198 condemned by the board. In 1876 424 houses were reported and 371 condemned, and in the report of the board of health for 1877, page 46, we find:

"'No meaner cabins for temporary or permanent shelter can be found than some our wretched poor are born and exist and die in here at the Capital of the United States. And, strange as it may seem, none so mean that they have not an owner mean enough to charge rent for them. Down in the alleys, below grade, with combination roof of tar, felt, shingles, rags, tin, gravel, boards, and holes; floors damp and broken, walls begrimed by smoke and age, so domiciled are families, with all the dignity of tenants having rent to pay. The board has condemned 153 such during the past year and 958 during the past four years, of which probably 300 have been entirely demolished. But many owners still cling to the wrecks.

"'Our experience in dealing with filth, crowd poison, and disease among these people during the past four years has taught us that the great public economy, viz, the preservation of public health, is defeated by allowing these filthy, worthless, dependent classes of humanity to congregate in the alleys and byways out of sight, and therefore out of mind, until direful epidemic, incubated and nourished among them, spreads its black wings over the homes of the whole city. Better far to provide for the aged and sick in public institutions of charity, the vagrant in the chain gangs, let the cost be what it may, than to allow them to remain propagators of public disease, an incalculable expense to the District.'"

This report was made at the close of the year 1908.

In April, 1903, the Washington Post said, editorially:

WE HAVE SLUMS OF OUR OWN.

"An English gentleman, who is also a philanthropist and a student of sociology, has been looking into the slums of Washington. Ten years ago he visited the Capital, but on that occasion saw only our splendid public parks and beautiful private residences, just like a very large majority of Washingtonians and visitors. He returned to England convinced that Washington was the long-looked-for model city. Now he pays a second visit, and this time he goes behind the scenes. The result of the investigation is an amendment to the gentleman's original estimate. He finds that while our areas of squalor and degradation are not as numerous or so extensive as those of London they are in many instances much more appalling. On this point he says:

"'This time I came to see the worst that was to be seen, and it has been a revelation to me. I have seen rooms with half a dozen or more people living in them. I have seen buildings that would be condemned and torn down in London if they were inhabited only by a coster's donkey. Walls tumbling down, floors rotten, ceilings and walls falling in, little yards and outbuildings filled with rubbish and dirt, and absence of all sanitary arrangements. Within a stone's throw of the British Embassy, in an alley, there are hovels that are not fit for pigs to live in. Within the shadow of the Capitol there are others. On Factory Hill and in the holes around the canal in Georgetown there are frightful places full of filth and the direst poverty, where disease and crime must breed rapidly.'"

In December of that year Jacob Riis, in an address delivered at the First Congregational Church of Washington City, had this to say on the subject:

"I am not easily discouraged. But I confess I was surprised by the sights I have seen in the National Capital. You people of Washington have alley after alley filled with people you know nothing about. There are 298 such alleys. They tell me the death rate among the negro babies born in these alleys is 457 out of 1,000 and before they grow up to be 1 year old. Nearly one-half. Nowhere I have ever been in the civilized world have I heard of a death rate like that. Why, I have never seen places like those you have here. * * *

"To fight your slums you ought first of all to acquire the right to deal with the evil man who insists on murdering your babies. But you are sure to run against the old cry of 'property rights.' One-half your children die in hovels before they reach the age of 1 year, because the owners would rather have 25 per cent profit than save their souls. For such a condition there's no defense. Where does the blame lie? With the owners of the slums, you will probably say. But it lies equally with the community which permits such a shameful and sinful condition of affairs to exist within its borders."

In commenting on this address the Washington Times said:

"This indictment of a community which has no slums, this astounding disclosure of a condition not paralleled by the squalor of New York or London or Paris, was the key last night to one of the most remarkable meetings held in Washington in many years. It was the judgment of a trained mind delivered after a trip through the Capital and expressed with manly courage and plain speech to an assembly of representative Washingtonians."

Under a more recent date the Times, in an extended editorial on slum conditions, said:

* * * "The thing needed here is such an education of the commercial instinct that owners of houses in the poorer neighborhoods will cease to expect extraordinary percentages on their investments. * * * It has been proved by investigation that the poor can be comfortably housed in clean, sanitary dwellings which will pay from 7 to 10 per cent on the investment if well managed. It has also been ascertained that the profits on much of the old-fashioned tenement and shanty property ran from 10 to 20 per cent, and even higher. This means that a few property owners are content to make money at the cost of the poor and at the risk of endangering the whole community through the disease and filth bred in their property. The way in which this kind of piracy can be avoided lies, first, in strictly enforced laws which will prevent overcrowding and insanitary buildings absolutely." * * *

Now let us see how far the conditions have improved since that time. During the year 1910 strenuous efforts were made to secure needed legislation and thus improve conditions which were fully disclosed at that time. Let me quote some of the things that were said of conditions as they then existed.

In an article in the Washington Times we find the following, quoting in part from remarks of Mr. E. W. Oyster, one of the good citizens here, who has labored incessantly for better conditions in the District:

"Washington is honeycombed with filthy alleys, spreading disease in even the most beautiful parts of the city. Scattered through every residence section are slums more objectionable than the congested districts of New York or London. The health department is fighting a desperate losing battle against conditions too deep rooted to be repaired without public aid.

"This was the warning that E. W. Oyster, of the Petworth Citizens' Association, hurled from the pulpit of the People's Church, East Capitol Street, yesterday morning. * * *

"'The people who own property in these slums,' said Mr. Oyster, 'are selling their souls for cash. And the tragedy of it is they are selling the lives of their own carefully guarded children for cash.

"'I shall not criticize the health department, because I believe Dr. Woodward is an efficient officer, alive to the situation but terribly handicapped.

"'The public is strangely indifferent. As a special examiner of the Pension Bureau I have had occasion to visit these places, and if the public could see them as I have seen them, and as Dr. Woodward and his assistants have seen them, there would be a clamor for reform.

"'We are spending millions making Washington beautiful, and it is beautiful; but what is beauty when it is rotten to the core? * * *

"'As it is, the Capital of the Nation is a disgrace, with a death rate higher than even such cities as Denver, where we send our sick people too late to get them well.

"'Behind the great mansions lay hovels that are natural disease breeders. In every part of this city, in the northwest as well as the southeast, citizens are being murdered through their own lack of interest and their own ignorance of what is going on behind their backs.'"

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in a statement made by him, as published in the Washington Times of September 21, 1914, has this to say:

"To those familiar with the alley conditions in the city of Washington no action in relation to the city's needs has been more imperatively needed than their elimination. If the good men and women knew of the actual conditions that exist within the shadow of the Nation's Capitol and realized the dangers to health and good morals that go out from them to all parts of the city the demand for their eradication would be universal, except from those who profit from conditions that are a disgrace to civilization and Christianity. There would be no grumbling about how to do it, nor would the rights of humanity be sacrificed for the rights of property.

"When the situation is understood there is not much basis except greed for opposition to what has been done. No substantial injury will be suffered by anyone. Any dwelling house lawfully on these alleys now has been there more than 20 years. The real annual profits from this property have been from 10 to 14 per cent, and so the owners have been paid for it more than twice over during that time. No property is confiscted. All these owners have to do is to change the use of their property or the conditions of use.

"If they make the alleys conform to the conditions of the law they can use their property for homes or business as they do to-day. They may be put to some expense; their excessive profits may be reduced; but their property will still be useful and profitable.

"Nothing more strikingly illustrates the power and influence of wealth and greed than the situation in regard to this alley problem. The public has been apathetic, business organizations composed of men of high standing have opposed this legislation unless the so-called rights of property owners are given the last farthing of protection, and the public health and safety and the pleadings of humanity have been subordinated to the financial interests or a few rapacious individuals.

"A few noble women interested themselves in the subject. They did splendid work, but it took the pleadings of a tender-hearted woman in an exalted place as she passed into the Valley of Death to bring action. Action has come, swift, sure, direct, complete, and the city of Washington without its slums and unspeakable alley conditions will be a fitting tribute and monument to the sweet nobility of Mrs. Wilson, who, from her exalted place as the first lady of the land, gave her time, strength, influence, and love for the happiness and comfort of the poor, lowly, and unfortunate, and whose last thoughts were not of her position, but of poor, suffering humanity."

In a circular published by the Monday Evening Club of Washington, in October, 1912, Thomas Jesse Jones, chairman of the housing committee of that club, has this to say:

"After 40 years of agitation and search for ways and means to eliminate the blind alleys of Washington, they still remain to spread crime and disease throughout the beautiful city and its inhabitants. Two startling facts should have swept these alleys out of existence years ago. One out of every three children born in these byways dies within the first year of life. To make matters worse, these houses with their diseases and crime, fill the center of many blocks rimmed with splendid houses and hotels.

"A glance at the map of Washington shows the dangerous proximity of these disease centers to the best residential blocks of the city.

"Some alleys have been eliminated to meet the demands of commercial enterprises. One disreputable place was converted into a minor street by assessments upon neighboring property equal to the cost involved in the change. Further application of this method was stopped by a Supreme Court decision in 1907 which cast doubt upon the legality of this form of assessment. At the last session of Congress $78,000 were voted for the change of the most notorious alley in the city into an inner park. This year the commissioners are planning to attack four more alleys.

"But, in spite of all these accomplishments and plans, there is no plan to attack the problem as a whole. A careful study of the whole situation leads to the conclusion that the final solution of the alley problem awaits the aroused public interest of the Nation. Let us add to our plans for a city beautiful a demand for a city pure. Let the woman's clubs of the land, the civic associations of the Nation, and political organizations of every State and city unite in the call for a National Capital that shall be both beautiful without and clean within."

In the same circular Mr. Wilbur Vincent Mallalieu says:

"The moral conditions in such a secluded inclosure as this court can scarcely be imagined. The police who have to do with it agree in speaking of its disreputable character. One officer has remarked that it is the worst place in the United States and that there is no crime unknown to it. The police blotter of the precinct shows that from March 1, 1911, to March 1, 1912, there were 114 arrests among the 204 men, women, and children living in Snows Court. The charges were drunkenness, disorderly conduct, assault, unlawful assembly, larceny, cruelty to animals, and accusations relating to sexual crimes. Nor does this number of cases represent all the evil, because it does not take into account residents of Snows Court arrested in other precincts, nor does it include the mischief done in Snows Court by inhabitants of the neighboring alleys and residents of other parts of the city. * * *

"Snows Court is a peril to our Capital's life. Only an awakened public conscience that shall demand the abolition of this and other pest centers will rid the city of very grave dangers."

I might go on almost without limit quoting from the sayings of newspapers and others as of that date condemning conditions and suggesting remedies, but I desist.

This showing should appeal strongly to Congress for relief.

In a directory of the inhabited alleys, issued as late as 1912, it is said by way of introduction:

"There are 275 of these interior courts in the city. They contain 3,337 houses used for dwellings and approximately 16,000 persons. They are so widely distributed throughout the city that even the best residential sections are not free from their evil influences. The northwest, the largest of the four general sections of the city, has 161, or nearly three-fifths of all the alleys.

"The statement which follows shows the number of alleys and alley houses for each section of the city:

"Total, alleys, 275; houses, 3,337.
"Northwest, alleys, 161; houses, 1,940.
"Southwest, alleys, 58; houses, 705.
"Northeast, alleys, 30; houses, 336.
"Southeast, alleys, 26; houses, 356.

"The average for each alley is 12.1 houses and 58.1 persons. Each alley house has an average of 4.8 persons."

Now, let us see what Congress has done to remedy or ameliorate these fearful conditions. In a pamphlet published by the committee on housing of the woman's welfare department of the National Civic Federation in November, 1912, it was recited:

"This first health board, which had begun its work of alley reclamation so nobly, was abolished and the office of health officer created by an act of Congress June 11, 1878. Right here the good work stopped, for in the legalization of the health ordinances in 1880, the section under which the health department acted in the condemnation of insanitary buildings was omitted. Whether this omission was an oversight or was secured by the influence of men whose money interests were at stake is not known, but it was 12 long years before any further remedial legislation was enacted and during those years no houses were condemned and new houses were constantly erected. Alley property had proved a paying investment and brick had succeeded wood as building material."

In 1892 an act was passed by Congress authorizing the commissioners to "condemn, open, extend, widen, or straighten alleys on the petition of the owners of more than one-half of the real estate in the square in which such alley is sought to be opened," etc.

Congress very magnanimously provided in this act that the whole of the expenses of such improvements should be assessed against the property owners in the square to be affected. By an act passed in 1894, the provisions of the act were extended to minor streets of a width of not less than 40 or more than 60 feet in width.

It goes without saying that these statutes amounted to practically nothing as a means of ridding the city of the evils I am considering.

By an act passed in 1906 a board for the condemnation of insanitary buildings was created and authorized to investigate and destroy or repair such buildings. This has resulted in the destruction of some of the buildings in these alleys, but it has wholly failed to reach the heart of the evil and has accomplished very little of good in respect of the slum evil.

In 1914 an act was passed making it unlawful "to erect, place, or construct any dwelling on any lot or parcel of ground fronting on an alley where such alley is less than 30 feet wide throughout its entire length and which does not run straight to and open on two of the streets bordering on the square and is not supplied with sewer, water mains, and gas and electric light."

The intention of this act was good and it is good as far as it goes, but that is a very short distance. It only prevents the construction of additional buildings in some of the alleys, which amounts to but little as a means of putting an end to evils that have existed for many years.

On March 3, 1915, another well-intentioned act was passed "to incorporate the Ellen Wilson Memorial Homes." This was a fitting memorial to a good woman whose generous and sympathetic heart went out in sympathy to the unfortunates who were denied the comforts of sanitary homes. But as a practical means of rendering the help she so much desired them to have, it will amount to nothing of permanent good. The work of correcting this great evil can not be delegated to private individuals. If it is ever done and done effectually it must be done by the Government and with its money, as I shall endeavor to point out further along.

There was one other act that was effective to destroy one of the worst of these slum alleys. It was the act to condemn Willow Tree Alley. In this instance the Government generously put up half of the money necessary to accomplish this commendable result. But even this beneficent effort has largely failed of its object because instead of opening out the alley to the sunlight and the public gaze it has been turned into an inside or inclosed park that has become the rendezvous of criminals, vagabonds, and the immoral and viciously disposed of the poorer classes that calls for police and sanitary inspection and control which is not always supplied.

In a report of the committee on improvement of existing houses and elimination of insanitary and alley houses of the President's Homes Commission, above mentioned, made December 8, 1908, some of the existing conditions are described and the difficulties of dealing with them effectually are pointed out.

For example, in speaking of one of the objectionable alleys it is said:

"One of these cases is Blagden's Alley, square 368, concerning which the chief of police and his associates on the board states in the recommendation for its conversion into a minor street that—

"'Blagden's Alley, located between Ninth and Tenth and M and N Streets, contains 54 houses inhabited by a negro element who live in poverty and are a source of constant trouble. The dwellings are insanitary and dilapidated and afford shelter to 10 or 12 persons each.'

"Another is square 620, as to which the board reported:

"'Logan Place contains 35 insanitary dwellings, which are very much overcrowded and the inhabitants, being of a vicious character, give the police more or less trouble.'

"Everyone familiar with these and other such labyrinths realizes the security from police supervision which they afford, to say nothing of other disadvantages which fully justified the recommendation of the board."

Then it was said:

"The principal difficulty with the present law seemed to be that it required that an amount equal to the damages found should be assessed as benefits, and that this should be assessed within a limited area. It was found that the law of 1906 in relation to the opening, extension, widening, or straightening of streets provided that the jury should assess benefits not only upon adjoining and abutting property but upon any and all other lots, pieces, or parcels of land which the jury might find to be benefited by the improvement. This apparently indicated a plan by which the amounts required could be raised in a more equitable manner, but as it seemed probable that in many cases the damages awarded would even then exceed the benefits which the jury might find, it seemed desirable to include also a provision by which a certain proportion of the awards could, if necessary, be paid out of some general fund.

"One of the commissioners has suggested, when the Engineer Commissioner recommended that the work be stopped on account of the expense, that legislation might be urged providing that the alleys be opened and a certain proportion of the expense be paid by the United States Government, another proportion by the District government, and the remainder be assessed upon the property owners in the neighborhood of the improvement. Inasmuch as the deplorable conditions of the alleys have grown up under the administration of the District government, it seems proper that a considerable portion of the expense of removing them should be borne in this way by those responsible for them; but, as any payment for District purposes by the Federal Government would be contrary to the definite policy adopted by Congress, it did not seem advisable to the committee to advocate such a provision."

The picture presented by the quotations I have made is not overdrawn. They do not disclose the whole truth. I have not depended on such information in reaching conclusions. I have examined enough of these slums and inspected enough of the dwellings located in them to speak of my own knowledge. The conditions are unspeakably bad. One who witnesses them for the first time is filled with a profound sense of pity and commiseration for the inmates, not unmixed with a feeling of shame and resentment that a great Nation like this, one of the richest and most powerful in the world and possessed of almost unlimited resources, should allow such conditions to exist in its Capital City.

Washington is a city of striking and abrupt contrasts. One may ride along a wide, well-paved, and attractive street lined with beautiful, almost palatial, homes and turn from it upon an old, worn-out, cobblestone or brick paved street lined with old, broken-down houses, many of them dilapidated and apparently unfit for human habitation. From that one can turn into what are politely called "inhabited alleys," "courts," "places," and find an appalling condition of poverty, destitution, and degradation. All this within a distance of two or three squares. Some of these alleys are blind alleys—that is to say, there is but one means of ingress and egress—and within is a labyrinth of alleys covering the entire inside of a square with a fringe of houses around the outside, some of them little better than those within except that they are easier of access.

Within such a square you find the most degrading conditions. It is almost beyond belief that human beings can live under such conditions. They have very justly been called pestholes of crime and disease. And yet the owners of the shacks and tumbled-down and insanitary houses are making more money out of the rent of them than is being made by the owners of first-class houses and business blocks. The rents are exorbitantly high. As an example, I visited one little old brick shanty with two small rooms up and two down stairs, without running water in the house, out of repair, plaster off the walls, ill-lighted, and poorly ventilated. This house was occupied by two families, each with two rooms, for which they paid $7 a month each, or $14 for this little, dilapidated, insanitary house that should have been condemned and destroyed under existing laws long since.

There is but one effective remedy for this dreadful condition. The Government should condemn the whole square as a sanitary measure and police regulation, tear everything out of it, root and branch, replat the ground, construct upon it model sanitary houses, rent them to the poorer classes of people who now inhabit the slums, and then supervise and inspect them, thus compelling the tenants to keep them in a sanitary condition inside as well as out. It will be said that all this will cost a lot of money. Yes; it will; but it will be money much better spent than are millions and millions of dollars that we are now throwing away for useless and illegal purposes.

The Agricultural Department is spending and wasting millions and millions of dollars on useless experiments and in work that should be done by the States and can not legitimately be done by the National Government. The Public Health Service is spending millions more in the States in violation of the spirit of the Constitution. We are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars for the cure of hogs and cattle in the States often where the Federal authorities have no lawful right or business to enter. We spend millions for agricultural colleges and vocational schools in the States, a work that belongs to and should be left to the States. We are spending money lavishly, extravagantly, and paternally in the States. The dividing lines between the States and the Federal Government are fast disappearing by the raid of the States on the National Treasury. The States are selling their jurisdiction and their sovereignty for money. We are centralizing our Government at an alarming rate and to a degree that I am afraid few appreciate and for purely mercenary and selfish reasons. The pork barrel is kept well filled. We are spending millions of dollars for public buildings in the States that are not needed and for the improvement of so-called rivers and creeks that are of no public use. No wonder the National Treasury is bankrupt and the people are being taxed to keep up these many illegitimate and useless expenditures. But when an effort is made to clean up the National Capital, which is within the jurisdiction of the Government and for which it is directly responsible, the purse strings are tightly drawn and the cheeseparing begins. The half-and-half system is appealed to as a reason and excuse for economy. And if the half-and-half system is adhered to, it may just as well be conceded now, once for all, that this necessary improvement can not be accomplished. The one-half of the money necessary for the initial work can not be raised by taxation. It would be ruinous. And so long as the Government hides itself behind the half-and-half system and contents itself by meeting one-half of the expenses the conditions in the Capital will continue as they are now, a disgrace and a reproach to the Nation.

These are conditions that should not be allowed to exist for a day in any city in a civilized country, much less in the Capital of a great Nation like ours. But, it will be asked, What is the remedy? The remedy is simple and easy, but expensive. The Government should take the matter vigorously in hand. As I have said, it should condemn and clean out these alleys at whatever cost. But it should not stop when it has turned these poor people out of their homes, however poor and insanitary they are. It should provide other homes for them at reasonable rents, to be under the inspection and control of the Government. This could be done as a matter of public safety and as a sanitary measure. This duty of providing homes for the poor and incompetent within the Capital should not be left to private enterprises seeking profits. Neither the cost nor the responsibility should be divided with anybody. To assess the damages resulting from such sanitary improvements to private owners of property is entirely unreasonable and wholly unjust. Our civic pride as well as our sense of justice should impel us to act in this matter promptly and effectively. It has been done in other countries. It can and should be done in this country within its Capital, over which it has exclusive control.

Of the means resorted to in London, England, and its results, the report of the housing committee above referred to has this to say:

"The housing of the working classes act, which was passed in 1890 and which superseded and improved previous attempts in this connection, provided not only that individual houses might be condemned as insanitary, as is done under the law of 1906 here, but also that an area containing streets and many houses might be declared 'unhealthy' and taken over by the local authority; and that the buildings might be removed, the streets rearranged, and other dwellings erected, either by agencies to which money would be furnished by the local authority, or if necessary by the local authorities themselves. In fact, the law made it obligatory upon the local authority in London to provide housing accommodations for at least 50 per cent of the people displaced, which has since been raised by an amendment making the required provision equal to all, and in other districts to such an amount as might be determined by the local authority to be adequate under all the circumstances.

"Under this housing of the working classes act numerous wretched districts have been cleared up and comfortable and healthy dwellings provided, and although the cost to the community has been considerable in certain cases where the evils to be remedied were of long standing and very great, the law has done great good and the attention of those interested in the subject is being given to improving its operation than to changing it in any radical way. It aims, so far as possible, to protect the interest of the community in acquiring any property which has become detrimental to the well-being of the district, while at the same time dealing justly with the owners. The method of procedure requires the local authority to take the initiative, and where a loan is necessary, as it often is where an area is acquired, the plans for this and for the improvement of the area must be approved by the central authority in London."

And comparing the conditions there with ours, it is said further:

"It will be noticed that the situation in the District of Columbia is similar to that in England in that the District government resembles the local authority, which can take the initiative in regard to any alleys which require attention, but which can not act without the consent of an authority not local, which in the case of the district is Congress.

"The ordinary danger in giving to public officials who are in entire control considerable discretion in the disbursement of public funds is therefore removed, and it ought to be possible for Congress to give such a plan a fair trial without incurring any very great risk."

The following, published in the Trades Unionist, is worthy of careful consideration:

"That the United States Government should make Washington the model for all cities of the country was the opinion of the delegates to the National City Planning Conference, which met in this city on May 22, 1909. It was the consensus of opinion of the delegates to this conference that the working out of the plans for the beautification along practical lines rather than for mere adornment should be the ideal worked for by all American cities in order that all classes of people shall be benefited.

"One of the speakers at the opening session of the conference was Robert A. Pope, landscape architect, of New York City. He said:

"'Of prime importance to the growth of the city-planning movement in America is the realization of its true nature, its proper aim, its vast social and economic import. Because of ignorance of the true scope of city planning, work in this country has not and can not, as at present understood, accomplish its primary function.

"'For example,' he said, 'we have assumed without question that the first object of city planning is to beautify. We have made the esthetic an objective in itself. We have rushed to plan showy civic centers of gigantic cost, the carrying out of which too often has been brought about by civic vanity, when pressing hard by we see the almost unbelievable congestion, with its hideous brood of evil, filth, disease, degeneracy, and crime. What external adornment can make truly beautiful such a city? Is it genuine foresight to neglect the present-day serious and fast-growing evils of congestion and bad housing, which is so directly a menace to future generations?

"'To forestall the disastrous and otherwise inevitable consequences of these conditions will be the richest service that city planning can accomplish for the future. That this is its true and primary function can be abundantly established. The example of European countries, especially that of Germany, demonstrates that wise city planning, with proper regulations, can alleviate and ultimately eradicate undue congestion, the festering source of most of our disease, crime, and degeneracy. To remedy congestion, then, is to help solve some of our most threatening social and economic problems.'

"The foregoing statement in regard to city planning and city management are probably true of all cities and are certainly true of Washington.

"'What external adornment can make truly beautiful such a city?' The Washington Times appears to have anticipated Mr. Pope's question when it said editorially:

"'No part of the greater Washington can be safely built upon a rotten foundation. There is no room in the city for such contrasts as foul alleyways and a parking system embracing the beauties of a paradise. The spirit that labors for the realization of the beautification project should at the same time strive for the elimination of the slum quarters.'

"The Washington Post says our alleys are 'pest holes'; Rev. J. M. Waldron, president of the Alley Improvement Association, brands them as 'plague spots'; President Roosevelt declared them 'a reproach to the Capital City'; and Senator McMillan 'a disgrace to our civilization.'

"'What external adornment can make truly beautiful such a city?'—a city honeycombed with disease-breeding, death-dealing, and crime-producing slums! Jacob Riis says they are worse than any he ever saw in New York City or in London, and Washington's death rate, when compared with that of the cities named and nearly all the other cities of its class in the United States and Europe seems to prove the truth of his statement."

If Congress will abolish the "local authority" here known as the District of Columbia, which is a mere incumbrance, and the half-and-half system and deal with this awful condition directly and with a free hand, the conditions can be eliminated from the life of the Capital as they should be.

There can be no possible excuse for them to remain. It is a shame to every American citizen that they have been allowed to exist at all.

Mr. WORKS. Now, Mr. President, the real question here is not whether this work ought to be done, but by whom it should be done, and whether it should be done by one department or bureau of the Government or by three or four separate and distinct departments or bureaus. My own opinion about it is that the best way to protect children is through sanitation; and that does not belong to the duties or obligations of the medical profession. If the Children's Bureau could be so organized with a sanitary force composed largely of sanitary engineers and experts along that line to do the work that is necessary to be done here in the District of Columbia for the purpose of bettering conditions, I should be glad to support a very liberal appropriation for that purpose; but if the Children's Bureau is simply going to make investigations on the outside, as it has done up to the present time, and publish pamphlets and data respecting conditions, I think it is almost a waste of money; and, as it is already being done by the Public Health Service and by the Department of Labor, and being carried on by charitable institutions very largely here in the District and elsewhere, it does not seem that there is any particular necessity for making appropriations of this kind for that purpose. What I should like to see done would be to confer all power on one of these bureaus, confine the work to that bureau, and furnish it with all the means necessary to do that work efficiently and promptly. I am inclined to think that, properly organized and conducted, there would be no better organization for that purpose than the Children's Bureau; but I should not want to appropriate money for that purpose until some such organization is provided for and means are then furnished to carry out efficiently what all of us believe ought to be done.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I can not permit this occasion to pass without expressing my earnest advocacy of the amendment increasing the appropriation for child-welfare work. The first obligation of civilization and government is to the child. Victor Hugo, friend of all mankind, furnished no greater illustration of devotion to humanity than his intense love of children. In his last great novel "Ninety-three," he gives us what is perhaps the most beautiful description of child life in literature. The scene is an old castle in the forest of La Vendee, the home of a French nobleman in the year 1793, one of the bloodiest years of the French Revolution. With the touch of a master Hugo pictures the three children of the nobleman, pursuing innocent delights within the castle, unaware of the war raging about them, of the relentless pursuit of their father by the revolutionists, of the destruction to which their habitation was doomed. Georgette, a baby girl of less than 2 years, leaves her cradle to chatter to a sunbeam, and Hugo utilizes the incident for the following tribute:

What a bird says in its song a child says in its prattle. It is the same hymn; a hymn indistinct, lisping, profound. The child has what the bird has not, the somber human destiny in front of it. Hence the sadness of men as they listen, mingling with the joy of the little one as it sings. The sublimest canticle to be heard on earth is the stammering of the human soul on the lips of infancy. That confused chirruping of a thought, that is as yet no more than indistinct, has in it one knows not what sort of artless appeal to the eternal justice; or is it a mute protest uttered on the threshold before entering in, a protest meek and poignant? This ignorance smiling at the Infinite compromises all creation in the lot that shall fall to the weak, defenseless being.

Let me repeat this last sentence:

This ignorance smiling at the Infinite compromises all creation in the lot that shall fall to the weak, defenseless being.

Mr. President, this sentence contains an indictment of society and government as just as it is terrible. Does the child die from preventable disease? Is it weakened or deformed through neglect, lack of knowledge, or lack of means to secure proper treatment? Some one must answer to the Almighty.

Go read the shameful records of infant mortality in this country of boasted enlightenment, of the deaths of mothers on the battle fields of maternity, battle fields where a sublimer valor is exhibited than in all the conflicts that are trumpeted by the tongue of history, and ask yourselves where the responsibility rests.

The creation of the Children's Bureau in 1912 was an effort on the part of the Federal Government to meet that responsibility, to the extent of its powers and facilities.

This bureau under the able leadership of Miss Lathrop has already brought to the public attention facts of appalling significance.

It has shown that in 1913 childbirth caused more deaths among the women of this country than any disease except tuberculosis; that although these deaths are largely preventable they are not diminishing, whereas the mortality due to typhoid fever was cut in half from 1900 to 1913, and the mortality due to tuberculosis was materially reduced; that of those who survived the ordeal of maternity untold thousands find their strength permanently wrecked, their health more or less impaired; that if this frightful condition is to be checked and remedied higher standards of care for women before, during, and after childbirth must be adopted.

It has made a careful survey of infant mortality in typical manufacturing towns, and it has established a definite relation between this mortality and low earnings. It found in one of the localities under investigation that of the babies with fathers earning less than $450 per year one in four died before reaching the age of 12 months. Fathers earning less than $450 per year amounted to 13.7 per cent of the wage-earning population in the industrial center under survey. It found that the greater number of babies had fathers in the wage group from $450 to $849 per annum, and that of these one in every six died before attaining the age of 12 months. It found that of the babies whose fathers earned $850, but less than $1,050, 1 in every 8 failed to live more than 12 months, and that where fathers earned $1,050 or more only 1 in 16 died in the first year.

It found that where families composed of 2 or more persons occupied one room the infant mortality was twice as high as where there was less than 1 person per room; that babies living in houses occupied by a single family died at the rate of 86.1 per 1,000, while those in tenements occupied by more than 6 families died at the rate of 236.6 per 1,000; that when the mother was a wage earner the baby's chances of living were less than when she was not.

When this bureau was established in 1912 it was ordered to report on all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life. For the first two years it had a staff of 15 persons, and an appropriation of $25,640 for each year. In 1914 the staff was increased to 76 persons, the annual appropriation to $164,460.

Public interest has been aroused in the work of this bureau to such an extent that it finds the present force utterly inadequate. It asks for an increase of 57 persons for its staff, calling for an additional appropriation of $187,520, the total requested being $352,160.

The bureau's bulletins on the care of infants have met unqualified indorsement and popularity. Letters from grateful mothers have reached the bureau which more than vindicate the wisdom of Congress in creating this beneficent agency.

The bureau is indexing and assembling the laws relating to child welfare not only for its own guidance but for the guidance of the Government in administering the child-labor law.

In cooperation with the General Federation of Women's Clubs it has instituted a Nation-wide campaign for the closer study of infant mortality, having set aside a certain week known as baby week, during which the entire country is to devote especial attention to all phases of this fundamental problem. More than 2,000 communities took part in baby week in 1916, and a splendid awakening on this great subject was evident.

The bureau is making a skillful and careful study of defective children and of child mortality in the rural districts.

The increased force now asked for will be barely sufficient to enable the bureau to meet the public demand for information regarding the work already undertaken.

It is to me a matter of wonder that Senators hesitate to vote the remarkably small amount desired for this overwhelmingly important work. I would deem it an honor and a duty to vote millions for it, instead of a few hundred thousands.

If I could have my way, I would have the Federal Government, in cooperation with the States, take whatever steps might be necessary to make certain the proper care of mother and of child in the supreme and holy crisis of maternity.

And this could be done with infinitely less than we expend each year for the terrible machinery of war.

It would be a measure of preparedness in the highest and most effective sense. Behind the machine stands the man. Behind the man stands the child.

Considering the sacredness and the value of the work, the amount desired is modest in the extreme. Including the requested increase, the total appropriation for this bureau will be less than 4 per cent of the cost of one first-class battleship.

It is not alone a question of expediency but of right. Every human being has an inalienable right to a normal birth. Every human being has an inalienable right to be born under sanitary and comfortable surroundings, under proper treatment and care. Every little life that perishes through lack of knowledge or neglect or finds a precarious survival within a feeble and defective body is an accusation of the Republic and an indictment of the flag.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the committee will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The Senator from Iowa requests the yeas and nays on the amendment of the committee. Is the request seconded?

Mr. KENYON. Before that is done, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on the committee amendment, on which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has requested the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not but think, Mr. President, that the controversy which has arisen over this appropriation is the result of misunderstanding and misapprehension. I am loath to believe that any Member of the Senate would favor the reduction of the appropriation of any reasonable sum of money which could be expended by the Children's Bureau in the work which it was commissioned to do by the statute which created that bureau. I do not know of any way in which we can build so strongly into our national life as by an intelligent and scientific study of the child from birth.

Before the Children's Bureau was created investigations regarding the public health, industrial insurance, and other matters pertaining to the physical well-being of the people were made by other bureaus of the Government. But, in the wisdom of Congress it was determined, four years ago, that there was a field unoccupied where the Government could direct inquiry and investigation to the great advantage of the American people and of our Government. There seemed to be, Mr. President, unexplored territory. There seemed to be obscured and little understood facts which in the interest of the Government and of our people should be thoroughly explored, and the Children's Bureau as the result of it all came into existence.

It was not hasty and ill-considered legislation. The subject had been widely discussed. Other Governments had pointed the way for us. So the Children's Bureau was created as the result of a solemn and deliberative congressional act to do a certain work necessary to the well-being of the American people.

Mr. President, that bureau has been engaged in the performance of the obligations and the duties imposed upon it by law for four years. It has never been in favor with the Appropriations Committee, either of the House or of the Senate. It was given at the outset an appropriation of $25,000. After it had inaugurated its work it asked for an increase in the appropriation. The House committee declined to give it. The House of Representatives took the matter away from the committee and increased the appropriation according to the request made by this bureau, and that action was confirmed by this body. The bureau again and again has been denied increased appropriations by the committees of Congress, and these increased appropriations have been voted by the body, either of the House of Representatives or the Senate. That, to my mind, just as a Member of the Senate observing legislation and its trend and course, has a certain significance.

So I say the fact that the committee has reported a cut in this appropriation should carry with it very little prestige. It lacks the force that it would have if the committees of Congress had shown toward the Children's Bureau that consideration which the Congress itself has shown.

As a rule we are inclined, Mr. President, to accept the investigations of committees. The multiplicity of legislative subjects considered by Congress makes that somewhat necessary. But when again and again and again some branch of the Government seems to be in the disfavor of the committees which have charge of the appropriations, and these are cut and cut again and cut once again, and the action of the committees is reversed by the body that created the committee, then I think I am warranted in arguing that we are not bound blindly to follow the committee in such an instance.

Mr. President, the Senate is immediately concerned with the two reductions made in this bill as it passed the House of Representatives. Because they seem to have been considered in that order by the Senate in the course of its procedure upon this bill, I take the second one first and ask the attention of the Senate for a moment to it. On page 143 the House of Representatives, considering this paragraph which I shall read presently, granted to the Children's Bureau an appropriation for the purposes set forth of $95,000. That amount is reduced by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, or the recommendation of that committee is for a reduction, from $95,000 to $58,000.

Now, what is the purpose to which this money would be applied? I ask the attention of Senators, because the reasons assigned by the committee for this reduction, I believe, are not sustained. I think the reasons assigned show a misapprehension of the purposes to which this expenditure was committed by the terms of the bill. I read from page 143:

> For traveling expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4, pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil act approved August 1, 1914, of officers, special agents, and other employees of the Children's Bureau; employment of experts and temporary assistants, to be paid at a rate not exceeding $8 a day—

I am reading it as it passed the House. The Senate committee proposes an amendment to that reducing it to $6 per day—> and of interpreters, to be paid at a rate not exceeding $4 a day when actually employed; purchase of reports and material for the publications of the Children's Bureau, books of reference, newspapers, and periodicals, including the advance payment of subscriptions for the same, for newspaper clippings to enable the Children's Bureau to secure data regarding the progress of legislation affecting children and the activities of public and private organizations dealing with children, and for reprints from State, city, and private publications for distribution when said reprints can be procured more cheaply than they can be printed by the Government, $95,000.

That is the amount the House voted the Children's Bureau for that purpose. That amount is reduced to $58,000 by the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, Mr. President, I want to give to Senators the reasons assigned by this committee on the floor of the Senate for that reduction. When this item of the bill was first reached on January 18 the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] first took the floor in opposition to the reduction. The Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], a member of this committee, arose in his place to make an explanation. It will appear from the RECORD that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] at the same time had obtained recognition, and he said:

> Mr. KENYON. If the Senator from Florida is going ahead, I will not take up the time; but it seems that the committee has placed the amounts just as they were last year. The amount last year for traveling expenses, per diem, and so forth, was $58,000. I doubt if they have calculated at all the reduction that will come from reducing the salaries to $6 a day in getting at that result.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; the House committee did that. The House committee allowed a per diem of $6, and the House raised it to $8. That explains the difference between $58,000 and $95,000. The committee thought $6 enough.

Mr. KENYON: Does that cover the whole difference in that item?

That is the reduction from $95,000 to $58,000. The Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] answered:

That is my understanding of it. The Senate committee put it back as the House committee reported it to the House, to have it in conference, after having read, however, the hearings before the House committee. My understanding is that that is what it is due to.

That is the reason a member of this committee furnishes to the Senate for making the reduction from $95,000 to $58,000—that it was based upon reducing the per diem pay of the field experts from $8 to $6.

Now, let us see what a poor understanding the committee had on that subject of the uses to which the $95,000 by the terms of the bill were to be applied. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], apparently well understanding that a reduction of the per diem pay of those who were to go into the bill would not justify any such cut as that, in response to the statement made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], submitted this statement:

I do not understand how that could be, because the number of experts and temporary assistants to be employed under this section is optional with the bureau head, apparently. There is no stated number that could be employed.

Then the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], a member of the Committee on Appropriations, replied:

Oh, well, of course; but then they stated before the committees how many people they had. That explains that item so far as I understand it.

That is, that the reduction of the per diem from $8 to $6 is the sole justification that this committee offers upon this floor for cutting this appropriation from $95,000 to $58,000.

Now, let us see what the fact is about the employment of these experts. There are 72 present members of the staff of the Children's Bureau, and of that number 27 are field agents. Of the 57 additional members to the staff asked for in the report of the head of this bureau and in the hearings before both committees 13 are to be field agents in addition to the 27 who are now field agents. Taking the report of the bureau as to the length of time employed by these field agents and the specific number, the reasons assigned by the committee through its member, the Senator from Florida, do not account in any measure for or justify the reduction of this item. I am going to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a memorandum which has been furnished me by Mr. A. J. McKelway and was prepared from information furnished by the department and open to anyone who may desire to secure it:

The debate on the subject of increasing the appropriation for the Children's Bureau, in accordance with the provision of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, indicates that the bureau has been more concerned with accomplishing its task than with informing Members of Congress concerning the real scope of its activities and its real usefulness to the country. There seems to be a considerable amount of misapprehension concerning the work of the bureau.

The Children's Bureau is charged by Congress with the duty of investigating and reporting upon all matters relating to children and child life in this Republic. It was given an initial appropriation of some $25,000, and worked along with this until it was fully organized and its lines of service carefully and scientifically projected.

Two years ago the demand for its services from all parts of the country became so great that it asked Congress to increase its appropriation from $25,000 to $164,000. Under the rules of the House the increase in the statutory positions could be defeated by a point of order, and the Appropriations Committee of the House reported back the same appropriation as heretofore. Whereupon the House took the matter in its own hands, and by making a lump-sum appropriation, in accordance with existing law, gave the bureau the $164,000 for which it asked. When the bill was reported to the Senate the Chief of the Children's Bureau urged the Senate committee to apportion this lump sum among the statutory positions, as originally designed. This was done, and the appropriation passed the Senate without a dissenting vote.

One year ago the bureau asked for an increase in its force, which was denied it.

This year it asked for an increase of $187,520. The Bureau of Education asked for an increase of $177,160, and the Public Health Service, which now has an appropriation of $3,103,156, asked for an increase of $325,236. Again the House Committee on Appropriations refused to grant the increase, and the House, by making again a provision for a lump sum, voted the bureau an increase of $109,000. Again the chief of the bureau appeared before the Senate Committee on Appropriations and asked that the sum granted by the House be apportioned among the statutory positions, as before. The Senate committee declined to do this, and simply amended the bill by striking out the increase granted by the House.

The bureau believed, and its estimates were concurred in by the Secretary of Labor, that $187,000 additional were needed for the successful prosecution of its work. The House agreed to give $109,000 increase, and the Committee on Appropriations asks that no increase be given.

The Senate committee further amended the House bill by reducing the maximum per diem for expert service from $8 to $6 a day, and the total amount for traveling expenses, employment of special agents, and the purchase of material for publication from $95,000 to $58,000.

It was argued on the floor of the Senate that this decrease in the total appropriation was due to the decrease from $8 a day to $6 a day in the Senate amendment, as the maximum per diem for expert service. The following table shows the rates of pay for expert service for the 7 persons employed at $8 per day for 377 days to have been $3,016 in the year 1916. It is argued that the cutting down of the per diem from $8 to $6 accounts for the whole decrease in the appropriation. Yet we find that the total decrease is $78,400 instead of the $3,000, which can be covered by the cut in the rate of per diem from $8 to $6 on the basis of the 1916 expenditure.

Disposition of positions at specified rates of pay, 1916 appropriation.

Rates.	Number of persons.	Total time worked.	Cost.
50 cents per hour	5	584 hours	$292.00
$1 per annum	19	19 years	19.00
$2.75 per diem	1	82 days	225.50
$3.00 per diem	24	1,131½ days	3,394.50
$3.50 per diem	2	326½ days	1,143.00
$4.00 per diem	13	791 days	3,164.00
$6.00 per diem	1	212 days	1,272.00
$8.00 per diem	7	377 days	3,016.00
Total	72		12,526.00

Those employed at $1 per annum were people in different parts of the country who thus received some official recognition for the service they did in cooperating with the Children's Bureau in its effort to secure birth-registration legislation by the different States.

The experts at a maximum of $8 per day are people who are asked to render expert service in the way of reading manuscripts and advising about their publication—service which can hardly be secured at any less amount.

The junior Senator from Florida made this inaccurate statement concerning the relation between the field agents and the office force. He said, "When you find out what they are going to do with the appropriation of $72,000, it is for the employment of 57 more clerks to stay here in Washington with the 76 they now have." And again he states that, "Only those designated as field agents, of which there are five, I think, will leave the city."

The fact is that of the 76 present members of the staff 27 are field agents, and of the 57 additional members asked for 13 are to be field agents in addition to the 72 persons doing expert temporary work outside of Washington, whose salaries are covered in the item of $58,000 which the House increased to $95,000 and the Senate reduced to $58,000 again.

The senior Senator from California criticises the bureau for not doing more work in the District of Columbia. When it was pointed out to him that the bureau had published a pamphlet on the feebleminded in the District of Columbia, the Senator contended, "I think one of the things that should be done by the Children's Bureau would be to make this investigation and to recommend to Congress what legislation seems to be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the Children's Bureau."

With regard to this very matter of the care of the feebleminded, the chief of the bureau appeared before the District Committee of the House and argued from the report which had been made, urging the provision of a colony for the feebleminded of the District.

Again, the chief of the bureau was appointed by the President a member of the committee to prepare a bill for a model juvenile court for the District of Columbia; a bill which has passed the House and is now pending in the Senate with a favorable report.

The bureau has in press a report on recreation in the District of Columbia.

So the bureau seems to be receiving criticism for not doing what it was charged with not doing in ignorance of the facts, but which it is doing in fact, as shown by the records.

A great deal has been said about the duplication of work. The Bureau of Education and the Public Health Service being especially mentioned. The senior Senator from California speaks of a child labor committee, which was organized under the Bureau of Labor some years ago. There has never been any such committee. The National Child Labor Committee, which was instrumental in securing the creation of the Children's Bureau, is an organization entirely supported by private subscription and has no relation to the Federal Government. It is going somewhat far afield in the search for duplication to confound the work of the Children's Bureau with the work of the National Child Labor Committee.

The investigations made by the Bureau of Labor, the bureau which was afterward expanded into the Department of Labor, concerning the labor of women and children under the special appropriation made by Congress in 1907 is not being duplicated by any work that the Children's Bureau has done.

The charge that the Children's Bureau is duplicating the work of the Public Health Service was effectively answered by the Junior Senator from Oregon, who indicated the difference between the pamphlets published by the Public Health Service on the diseases of man and the pamphlets concerning the care of children published by the Children's Bureau.

Duplication is a word that should not be too loosely used. Duplication involves an original and a copy, and the challenge has been successfully made to show a single piece of work done by any other department of the Government which has been duplicated after the date of such publication by the Children's Bureau. If there has been duplication of work let the responsibility lie with the department which has done the duplication, and not with the Children's Bureau, which has proved itself to be entirely innocent in this regard, as was stated in a memorandum read by the Clerk of the Senate on Friday last, and published in the RECORD of January 19.

From this it appears that the only piece of duplication that has been done was done by the Public Health Service in publishing a pamphlet on the care of the baby after the work of the Children's Bureau on Infant Care, treating the subject from a popular standpoint, was already well under way, and that there has been a great demand for both pamphlets—greater than could be supplied.

The Senior Senator from New Hampshire contends that the activities of the bureau in connection with the celebration of Baby Week do not appeal to him as a very desirable thing. The Senator could not have appreciated what an enormous advantage it has been to the communities of the Nation to study for a week under expert advice and assistance the problems of infanthood. More than 2,200 localities this year throughout this country—the Children's Bureau working in cooperation with the General Federation of Women's Clubs—gave a week or a good part of a week to studying the needs of the babies in every locality, and considering whether the communities were giving the babies a fair chance for life and health. State universities and boards of health cooperated with local agencies.

Doubtless many more such communities will endeavor to make such a study this year, and it seems most unwise to cripple the activities of the bureau by denying it the increase it asks.

The Senior Senator from Wyoming made the point that we had better proceed slowly in this matter of increasing appropriations for the Children's Bureau. An increase of $109,000 for doing more effectively the great work of investigating and reporting upon "all matters relating to the welfare of children and child life in this Republic" is not much more than has been asked for a single public-building bill in a not populous community.

The following table shows just what the increases are and for what purpose:

ANALYSIS OF NEW POSITIONS.

Administrative clerk at $2,000	1
Research expert at $2,000	1
Clerks:
Class 4—Increase of 3 at $1,800	3
1 head editorial.
1 reference, translation, and research.
1 statistical research expert.
Class 3—Increase of 4 at $1,600	4
1 reference assistant expert.
1 legal indexer.
1 industrial research assistant.
1 social service research assistant.
Class 2—Increase of 6 at $1,400	6
1 secretary to assistant chief.
1 hygiene research assistant.
1 industrial research assistant.
3 statistical examiners of schedules.
Class 1—Increase of 7 at $1,200	7
1 reference indexer.
5 statistical tabulating clerks.
1 stenographer-clerk.
Clerks at $1,000—Increase of 17	17
9 statistical clerks.
7 stenographers, general administration.
1 assistant filing clerk.
Special agents at $1,400—Increase of 5	5
All to be used for surveys, chiefly rural, child welfare, including child labor.
Special agents at $1,200—Increase of 8 submitted for rural work	8
5 qualified as trained nurses.
3 as special agents for general field work, rural or urban, including child labor and accident studies.
Copyists at $900—Increase of 4	4
General economy office force.
1 assistant messenger $720.
Total positions	57

The following table shows a list of projects that are being held up for lack of assistance in the office, and why more clerks in the office are needed. The value of such publications is in their timeliness, and if they are postponed unduly the conditions may change to some extent so as to render the reports less valuable. Therefore the criticism of the senior Senator from Florida as to the number of clerks to be employed in Washington, while not founded upon the real facts in the case, falls entirely to the ground when the need is set forth for such assistance as will enable the bureau to publish promptly the reports whose material is collected by field agents and special agents:

JANUARY 20, 1917.

Twenty-four reports in process are retarded in the office for lack of clerical assistance commensurate with the field service, as follows:

Infant mortality studies	5
Akron, Brockton, New Bedford, Saginaw, Waterbury.
Industrial studies	12
Child-labor handbook, administration of child-labor laws: Ohio, Massachusetts, Maryland, Wisconsin, Providence, St. Louis, New Orleans, Detroit, Newark, Philadelphia, and Street Trades Report.
Rural child and maternal welfare studies, in North, South, and West	3
Illegitimacy	1
Feeble-minded children	1
Recreation report	1
Mothers' pensions	1
Total	24

The bureau has been given a great task by Congress. Some of those who opposed the creation of the bureau are naturally opposed to any increase in the activities of the bureau, but since Congress by an overwhelming vote of both Houses did create the bureau; did charge it with a great task for advancing the welfare of child life through investigation and publication of the facts; since the bureau feels that it needs an increase of $178,000, but is willing to accept the increase which the House gave it of $109,000; it does seem that the Senate should grant the same increase and not stop all progress along these lines of endeavor.

Following that I want to call the attention of the Senate to the next reduction in this bill and the reason given by the committee for striking out the $72,120 provided by the House of Representatives for carrying on the work, as indicated in the bill. On page 143 of the bill the first three lines contain the item stricken out by the committee, which is as follows:

To investigate and report upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially investigate the questions of infant mortality, $72,120.

The reason which the committee, through its members on this floor, assign for striking that out is that it duplicates the work of other bureaus and departments of the Government. The committee submitted to the Senate just two authorities in support of their statement that the Children's Bureau in the work provided for by that appropriation was duplicating work performed by other departments and bureaus of the Government. First, the Senator from Florida read the evidence of Mr. Wood, of the Bureau of Efficiency, upon that subject, and, second, the Senator read a statement from the report of the Secretary of Labor to support the contention of the committee that there was duplication of the work provided for in the first three lines on page 143 of the bill, to wit:

To investigate and report upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially investigate the questions of infant mortality, $72,120.

The only evidence of duplication furnished to the Senate is the testimony of Mr. Wood, of the Efficiency Commission, and a statement read from the report of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. BRYAN. And, if the Senator will permit me, the absolute evidence of the documents showing the duplication.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The evidence of the pamphlets the titles of which the Senator read means nothing. The Senator exhibited a bundle of pamphlets here, from which he read the titles, and asked the Senate to believe from the titles of those pamphlets that a duplication of work was being carried on by the different bureaus. No one, not even the Senator himself, professed to have examined those pamphlets, or, if he had examined the contents of the pamphlets, he did not show by any presentation of material from those pamphlets that there was any duplication of work. But, Mr. President, even if he had done so, it would signify nothing, for by the terms of the law of Congress that particular field was assigned to the Children's Bureau, and any other bureau that invades that field reserved by the law to the Children's Bureau is the bureau that should be limited, either through a cut in its appropriation or by legislation limiting the authorization of its work to other fields. Understand me, Senators, the law that created the Children's Bureau by its very terms made the particular investigation provided for by this item as the work of the Children's Bureau and of no other branch or department or bureau of this Government. That law provides:

The said bureau shall investigate and report to said department upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life among all classes of our people, and shall especially investigate the questions of infant mortality.

Find that, if you will, in the authorization of the work of any other bureau in specific terms.

Mr. BRYAN. What is that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the law which created the Children's Bureau and which gives it by its very terms the exclusive field of the investigation of infant mortality by specific words.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator does not deny that the Public Health Service has the same authority, does he?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I deny that any other bureau authorized to do work generally along the lines of health and sanitation can, against a specific provision of that sort in the statute creating this bureau, invade the investigating work of this bureau on child mortality. There can not be any question about that, because the language is specific.

Mr. BRYAN. What does the Senator have to say about the $250,000 appropriated for the Bureau of Health—

For investigations of diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, including sanitation—

And so forth?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is a general authorization and can not be cited to take away from the Children's Bureau the specific authority conferred upon it by the statute. I do not care what Congress may have done in a blundering way in giving to some other bureau a large appropriation. I know that some bureaus have the special favor of the Appropriations Committee and some have not.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, well, the Senator can not justify that statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And we may get a little more light on that before this discussion is closed.

Mr. BRYAN. I will not interrupt the Senator until he furnishes it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I furnish it, it will be worthy the attention of the Senator.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, the Senator has not furnished it so far.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want the Senators who are following me here to get that specific declaration of the law well in their minds.

The said bureau shall investigate and report to said department upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life among all classes of our people, and shall especially investigate the questions of infant mortality, the birth rate, orphanage, juvenile courts, desertion, dangerous occupations, accidents and diseases of children, employment, legislation affecting children in the several States and Territories.

Now, Mr. President, a member of this committee, the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], offered the testimony of Mr. Wood and the statement of Secretary Wilson in support of the cut in this item. I shall presently talk about the work that the bureau has undertaken and is prosecuting under the provision of the law directing it to make an investigation of infant mortality, its importance to the very life of this Nation. But, first, Mr. President, let us see upon what authority this committee concluded that there was such a duplication of work as warranted it in driving the Children's Bureau out of this field which the law has said it should occupy and giving it to some other bureau under such general terms as an authorization to investigate the public health.

Now, let us see what Mr. Wood said about it, and aside from the high value of the work, which this bureau is doing in that field there is not any better reason that the Senate can find for restoring that very item than the statement of Mr. Wood. I will read that portion of it which the Senator from Florida read and put in the RECORD as his justification for cutting out this appropriation of $72,000 for prosecuting a study of infant mortality by the Children's Bureau as provided by law. Listen. The Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] is speaking:

Now, coming to the item stricken out of the bill at the top of page 143—an appropriation of $72,120 for the Children's Bureau to investigate and report upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially to investigate the questions of infant mortality—the reasons that induced the committee to strike that out, I think, can be best stated by reading from the House hearings the testimony of Mr. Wood, of the Efficiency Bureau. I will not read it all, but here is the situation which exists now. The Bureau of Health is engaged in this same kind of work. The Bureau of Labor is engaged in the same sort of work.

Mr. President, those are very general statements—statements, however, the importance of which requires that they be backed up by something that shows that the two bureaus referred to are doing the kind of work which the Children's Bureau is doing in investigating the causes of infant mortality in this country. I am going to put in the RECORD a summary of the investigative work already under way by this bureau on that subject, and I challenge any Senator on this floor to put side by side with it the reported work of any other bureau which will show a duplication of that work. You may find that some bureau prosecuting its work under some loose general authorization of Congress has investigated whooping cough or diphtheria, but those diseases are not touched here. This investigation has another and a broader significance which strikes down to the root of our industrial life, and no other bureau and no other department has touched that field with regard to infant mortality. And, Mr. President, until the Senate and the country understand what it is proposed shall be done here the great work of this bureau shall not be stricken down without protest that will be heard.

I continue reading from Senator BRYAN's statement:

For instance, under the heading "Field investigations," in the Bureau of Health, I find the following.

Now, mark you, this is given as a reason for striking out the item of appropriation of $72,000 to prosecute an investigation of infant mortality along lines specially and solely prosecuted by this particular bureau.

He says:

For investigations of diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, including sanitation, etc., $250,000.

Now, he comments on that as follows:

That is in the sundry civil bill of last year. In this very bill, on page 102, we find the following—

I am going to ask to have the general conversation suspended a little bit. We will make more progress with this bill if that is done.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there is a continuous buzz at the back end of the Chamber which prevents those of us who would like to hear the Senator from hearing him. I insist that we should have order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, since this interruption has taken place, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will not suspend his remarks, that I may ask to have the bill temporarily laid aside?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly; I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the bill now under consideration be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. STONE (at 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.). Mr. President, the committee appointed by the Chair to visit the President of the United States and inform him of the action taken by the Senate in response to his communication have performed the duty assigned to them, and I report that the President has indicated his pleasure and desire to respond at 1 o'clock. He is now awaiting the presence of the committee.

At 1 o'clock p. m. the President of the United States was announced by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate (Charles P. Higgins), and the President was escorted by the committee to a seat on the right of the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, the President of the United States.

The President addressed the Senate, as follows (S. Doc. No. 685):

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate: On the eighteenth of December last I addressed an identic note to the governments of the nations now at war requesting them to state, more definitely than they had yet been stated by either group of belligerents, the terms upon which they would deem it possible to make peace. I spoke on behalf of humanity and of the rights of all neutral nations like our own, many of whose most vital interests the war puts in constant jeopardy. The Central Powers united in a reply which stated merely that they were ready to meet their antagonists in conference to discuss terms of peace. The Entente Powers have replied much more definitely and have stated, in general terms, indeed, but with sufficient definiteness to imply details, the arrangements, guarantees, and acts of reparation which they deem to be the indispensable conditions of a satisfactory settlement. We are that much nearer a definite discussion of the peace which shall end the present war. We are that much nearer the discussion of the international concert which must thereafter hold the world at peace. In every discussion of the peace that must end this war it is taken for granted that that peace must be followed by some definite concert of power which will make it virtually impossible that any such catastrophe should ever overwhelm us again. Every lover of mankind, every sane and thoughtful man must take that for granted.

I have sought this opportunity to address you because I thought that I owed it to you, as the council associated with me in the final determination of our international obligations, to disclose to you without reserve the thought and purpose that have been taking form in my mind in regard to the duty of our Government in the days to come when it will be necessary to lay afresh and upon a new plan the foundations of peace among the nations.

It is inconceivable that the people of the United States should play no part in that great enterprise. To take part in such a service will be the opportunity for which they have sought to prepare themselves by the very principles and purposes of their polity and the approved practices of their Government ever since the days when they set up a new nation in the high and honourable hope that it might in all that it was and did show mankind the way to liberty. They cannot in honour withhold the service to which they are now about to be challenged. They do not wish to withhold it. But they owe it to themselves and to the other nations of the world to state the conditions under which they will feel free to render it.

That service is nothing less than this, to add their authority and their power to the authority and force of other nations to guarantee peace and justice throughout the world. Such a settlement cannot now be long postponed. It is right that before it comes this Government should frankly formulate the conditions upon which it would feel justified in asking our people to approve its formal and solemn adherence to a League for Peace. I am here to attempt to state those conditions.

The present war must first be ended; but we owe it to candour and to a just regard for the opinion of mankind to say that, so far as our participation in guarantees of future peace is concerned, it makes a great deal of difference in what way and upon what terms it is ended. The treaties and agreements which bring it to an end must embody terms which will create a peace that is worth guaranteeing and preserving, a peace that will win the approval of mankind, not merely a peace that will serve the several interests and immediate aims of the nations engaged. We shall have no voice in determining what those terms shall be, but we shall, I feel sure, have a voice in determining whether they shall be made lasting or not by the guarantees of a universal covenant; and our judgment upon what is fundamental and essential as a condition precedent to permanency should be spoken now, not afterwards when it may be too late.

No covenant of cooperative peace that does not include the peoples of the New World can suffice to keep the future safe against war; and yet there is only one sort of peace that the peoples of America could join in guaranteeing. The elements of that peace must be elements that engage the confidence and satisfy the principles of the American governments, elements consistent with their political faith and the practical convictions which the peoples of America have once for all embraced and undertaken to defend.

I do not mean to say that any American government would throw any obstacle in the way of any terms of peace the governments now at war might agree upon, or seek to upset them when made, whatever they might be. I only take it for granted that mere terms of peace between the belligerents will not satisfy even the belligerents themselves. Mere agreements may not make peace secure. It will be absolutely necessary that a force be created as a guarantor of the permanency of the settlement so much greater than the force of any nation now engaged or any alliance hitherto formed or projected that no nation, no probable combination of nations could face or withstand it. If the peace presently to be made is to endure, it must be a peace made secure by the organized major force of mankind.

The terms of the immediate peace agreed upon will determine whether it is a peace for which such a guarantee can be secured. The question upon which the whole future peace and policy of the world depends is this: Is the present war a struggle for a just and secure peace, or only for a new balance of power? If it be only a struggle for a new balance of power, who will guarantee, who can guarantee, the stable equilibrium of the new arrangement? Only a tranquil Europe can be a stable Europe. There must be, not a balance of power, but a community of power; not organized rivalries, but an organized common peace.

Fortunately we have received very explicit assurances on this point. The statesmen of both of the groups of nations now arrayed against one another have said, in terms that could not be misinterpreted, that it was no part of the purpose they had in mind to crush their antagonists. But the implications of these assurances may not be equally clear to all,—may not be the same on both sides of the water. I think it will be serviceable if I attempt to set forth what we understand them to be.

They imply, first of all, that it must be a peace without victory. It is not pleasant to say this. I beg that I may be permitted to put my own interpretation upon it and that it may be understood that no other interpretation was in my thought. I am seeking only to face realities and to face them without soft concealments. Victory would mean peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest, not permanently, but only as upon quicksand. Only a peace between equals can last. Only a peace the very principle of which is equality and a common participation in a common benefit. The right state of mind, the right feeling between nations, is as necessary for a lasting peace as is the just settlement of vexed questions of territory or of racial and national allegiance.

The equality of nations upon which peace must be founded if it is to last must be an equality of rights; the guarantees exchanged must neither recognize nor imply a difference between big nations and small, between those that are powerful and those that are weak. Right must be based upon the common strength, not upon the individual strength, of the nations upon whose concert peace will depend. Equality of territory or of resources there of course cannot be; nor any other sort of equality not gained in the ordinary peaceful and legitimate development of the peoples themselves. But no one asks or expects anything more than an equality of rights. Mankind is looking now for freedom of life, not for equipoises of power.

And there is a deeper thing involved than even equality of right among organized nations. No peace can last, or ought to last, which does not recognize and accept the principle that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property. I take it for granted, for instance, if I may venture upon a single example, that statesmen everywhere are agreed that there should be a united, independent, and autonomous Poland, and that henceforth inviolable security of life, of worship, and of industrial and social development should be guaranteed to all peoples who have lived hitherto under the power of governments devoted to a faith and purpose hostile to their own.

I speak of this, not because of any desire to exalt an abstract political principle which has always been held very dear by those who have sought to build up liberty in America, but for the same reason that I have spoken of the other conditions of peace which seem to me clearly indispensable,—because I wish frankly to uncover realities. Any peace which does not recognize and accept this principle will inevitably be upset. It will not rest upon the affections or the convictions of mankind. The ferment of spirit of whole populations will fight subtly and constantly against it, and all the world will sympathize. The world can be at peace only if its life is stable, and there can be no stability where the will is in rebellion, where there is not tranquillity of spirit and a sense of justice, of freedom, and of right.

So far as practicable, moreover, every great people now struggling towards a full development of its resources and of its powers should be assured a direct outlet to the great highways of the sea. Where this cannot be done by the cession of territory, it can no doubt be done by the neutralization of direct rights of way under the general guarantee which will assure the peace itself. With a right comity of arrangement no nation need be shut away from free access to the open paths of the world's commerce.

And the paths of the sea must alike in law and in fact be free. The freedom of the seas is the sine qua non of peace, equality, and cooperation. No doubt a somewhat radical reconsideration of many of the rules of international practice hitherto thought to be established may be necessary in order to make the seas indeed free and common in practically all circumstances for the use of mankind, but the motive for such changes is convincing and compelling. There can be no trust or intimacy between the peoples of the world without them. The free, constant, unthreatened intercourse of nations is an essential part of the process of peace and of development. It need not be difficult either to define or to secure the freedom of the seas if the governments of the world sincerely desire to come to an agreement concerning it.

It is a problem closely connected with the limitation of naval armaments and the cooperation of the navies of the world in keeping the seas at once free and safe. And the question of limiting naval armaments opens the wider and perhaps more difficult question of the limitation of armies and of all programmes of military preparation. Difficult and delicate as these questions are, they must be faced with the utmost candour and decided in a spirit of real accommodation if peace is to come with healing in its wings, and come to stay. Peace cannot be had without concession and sacrifice. There can be no sense of safety and equality among the nations if great preponderating armaments are henceforth to continue here and there to be built up and maintained. The statesmen of the world must plan for peace and nations must adjust and accommodate their policy to it as they have planned for war and made ready for pitiless contest and rivalry. The question of armaments, whether on land or sea, is the most immediately and intensely practical question connected with the future fortunes of nations and of mankind.

I have spoken upon these great matters without reserve and with the utmost explicitness because it has seemed to me to be necessary if the world's yearning desire for peace was anywhere to find free voice and utterance. Perhaps I am the only person in high authority amongst all the peoples of the world who is at liberty to speak and hold nothing back. I am speaking as an individual, and yet I am speaking also, of course, as the responsible head of a great government, and I feel confident that I have said what the people of the United States would wish me to say. May I not add that I hope and believe that I am in effect speaking for liberals and friends of humanity in every nation and of every programme of liberty? I would fain believe that I am speaking for the silent mass of mankind everywhere who have as yet had no place or opportunity to speak their real hearts out concerning the death and ruin they see to have come already upon the persons and the homes they hold most dear.

And in holding out the expectation that the people and Government of the United States will join the other civilized nations of the world in guaranteeing the permanence of peace upon such terms as I have named, I speak with the greater boldness and confidence because it is clear to every man who can think that there is in this promise no breach in either our traditions or our policy as a nation, but a fulfilment, rather, of all that we have professed or striven for.

I am proposing, as it were, that the nations should with one accord adopt the doctrine of President Monroe as the doctrine of the world: that no nation should seek to extend its polity over any other nation or people, but that every people should be left free to determine its own polity, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful.

I am proposing that all nations henceforth avoid entangling alliances which would draw them into competitions of power, catch them in a net of intrigue and selfish rivalry, and disturb their own affairs with influences intruded from without. There is no entangling alliance in a concert of power. When all unite to act in the same sense and with the same purpose all act in the common interest and are free to live their own lives under a common protection.

I am proposing government by the consent of the governed; that freedom of the seas which in international conference after conference representatives of the United States have urged with the eloquence of those who are the convinced disciples of liberty; and that moderation of armaments which makes of armies and navies a power for order merely, not an instrument of aggression or of selfish violence.

These are American principles, American policies. We could stand for no others. And they are also the principles and policies of forward looking men and women everywhere, of every modern nation, of every enlightened community. They are the principles of mankind and must prevail. [Applause.]

Upon the conclusion of the address, at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m., the President of the United States, escorted by the committee of the Senate, retired from the Chamber.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside that we may proceed with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what was the action taken?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business before the Senate—the water-power bill—was temporarily laid aside that the appropriation bill might be proceeded with. Is that course satisfactory to the Senator?

Mr. WALSH. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside and the Senate resumes consideration of the appropriation bill.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I know how difficult it will be to bring the Senate back to a consideration of the pending question. I think we must all feel, sir, that we have passed through an important hour in the life of the world. The business before the Senate, upon which I was addressing this body, related to the striking out of the provision on page 143 of the pending bill, which is as follows:

> To investigate and report upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially investigate the questions of infant mortality, $72,120.

If this provision is to be stricken out, Mr. President, this body will go on record as deciding that it will not spend $72,120 to prosecute an investigation as to the death rate among children of very tender age—of infant mortality—and if it takes that position, it will take it with the fact on the record that there is an investigation of that sort under way by a bureau of this Government authorized by law to make the investigation, and it is the only bureau of this Government that is authorized by law to make that investigation.

In specific terms the Congress of the United States directed this bureau to ascertain all the facts surrounding the vitally important question of the high death rate among children of very tender age; and, Mr. President, the Census Bureau furnishes ample reasons why Congress should so legislate. It records the startling fact that out of every eight children born in the United States at least one dies before it reaches the age of 1 year. I suppose that it was in contemplation of that high mortality rate that Congress enacted this legislation. Congress concluded that it was necessary, right at the fountainhead of national life, to ascertain what meant this rapid and devastating depletion. If the American people are to undertake to hold and maintain their high place among the nations of the world, then, sir, we must conserve our national life. Where shall we begin? At its source. If we find there a death rate that is appalling, is it not reasonable that Congress shall so legislate as, first of all, to know the facts about it; to ascertain the underlying causes? You can treat with legislation no case affecting our national life excepting that it be accurately and scientifically diagnosed.

Mr. President, it seems that we had a bureau clothed with power to make general investigations with regard to health conditions; but that was not enough. That is a tremendous field of inquiry in itself. That related to diseases that afflict mankind all the way from birth to the tomb; but in the wisdom of Congress it was believed necessary that there should be a thoroughgoing investigation, such an investigation as would be productive of results that, when laid before the American people in popular form, would work reformation and bring about a saving of child life to this Nation. To that end Congress, after mature deliberation, built up the Children's Bureau. This bureau, in pursuance of the act which created it, keeping rigidly and precisely within the limits of that act, has prosecuted its investigations.

Sir, if there be fault anywhere, such as the criticisms of the committee in charge of this bill would indicate, I very much fear that it lies at our own door rather than with the department. Congress, Mr. President, legislates somewhat loosely. There has been for a considerable period more or less discussion as to whether or not it would be wise for Congress to establish a bill-drafting bureau or division to aid Congress in its work of preparing legislation. Many of the most important parliamentary bodies in the world employ an agency of that kind, among them the British Parliament, and many of the States of our own Union. There has been discussion from time to time here upon this floor as to whether or not it might be wise for us to employ men who would carefully consider bills pending before Congress, who would, when called upon, aid in framing legislation, with a view, Mr. President, that the laws enacted by Congress should be wisely enacted and should attain the objects sought by the membership of the two branches of the legislative department of this Government.

I myself have urged upon this floor the passage of legislation which would lead to our having the aid of men expert in the work of drafting bills, and who would study particularly the statutes of the Federal Government, to the end that we shall not be constantly enacting overlapping statutes, duplicating and confusing the work of Congress.

Now, Mr. President, we have a situation here which is some explanation of the attitude taken by the committee. Congress itself has made authorizations which overlap each other. It is not difficult, Mr. President; it is simple to read the legislative enactments which created the Health Bureau, the bureau in the Department of Labor which investigates industrial conditions and gathers statistics; the Children's Bureau, and various other bureaus which have been cited here as being in conflict with and duplicating the work of each other; but, Mr. President, I stand here to say that Congress has been in a large measure protected against its own blundering by the departments. They have helped amazingly to prevent duplication of work; but they have not been able to stop it altogether, because Congress has authorized this bureau in that department, another bureau in another department, and another bureau in yet another department to do the work, and not only authorized but directed each to do the work, and the direction and authorization are imperative. They are under the command of Congress to do it, and oftentimes the phraseology of such legislative enactments is so general, so inapt, so inartistic, so unscientific that they overrun each other and lead to more or less confusion in the departments. Mr. President, the departments have sought again and again, as shown by their reports, to restrict their operations clearly within what they might assume, not from the language used but broadly interpreting the intent of Congress, was its purpose in directing that work be done. There has been an effort on the part of the various bureaus of the Government to take counsel with each other in an endeavor not to squander the public money as is directed by the specific terms of the acts passed by Congress, but to serve the purposes of legislation and yet not duplicate the work.

Notwithstanding that, Mr. President, there may be some duplication of work. But, sir, when you come to the item under consideration, upon which I am addressing the few Members of the Senate who are now present—of course if this were a public-building bill, where every Senator had some "pork" in the barrel, they would be on the job looking out for it, but as this is only a matter which concerns the life of the Nation there are only 13 Senators present, and I have a notion to call their names in order that it may be known who they are.

Senators should understand that back of this is a question of whether we can reduce the high death rate in the first year of the life of the children of the country. There is an amendment pending, proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out $72,120, asked for by the bureau and granted by the House of Representatives to continue an investigation upon that subject, when the facts, generally stated, are that one baby out of every eight born dies before the age of 1 year. Now, the investigation that is to be interrupted by the economic policy of the committee shows, Mr. President, from intensive studies of particular localities that in certain localities the death rate of children of tender age is phenomenally high, and that it bears some relation to the wages that the fathers earn and to the conditions under which those children are born, to the burdens which the mothers of those children had to carry when they were carrying the children before birth, and to the labor that they had to perform within the four months after the birth of the baby. These investigations are conducted with thoroughness. They do not deal with diseases that the health department is investigating; they deal with conditions peculiar to the life of the American people and vital to be understood if we are to perpetuate a great and a vigorous nation. For the paltry saving of $72,000 this great study, the details of which I shall lay before the Senate—I am only waiting until more Senators are here—is to be suspended. The question is whether, for the sake of this contemptible pittance of $72,000, we are going on blindly in our ignorance, permitting conditions to continue here under which the infant mortality rate is not one in eight, but one in four or one in six, for that is what it is under some of the conditions that this investigation, so far as conducted, shows to exist. Mr. President, powerful as the great Appropriations Committee is, no committee of this Senate and no branch of the legislature is powerful enough to interpose between the greed of the manufacturing classes who employ labor in this country and the perpetuation of a vigorous American people.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. In view of the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin that there are only 13 Senators present—which I think, however, is rather a high number during a discussion of this matter—I think that more Senators should be present; and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The SECRETARY called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Fletcher	Nelson	Smoot
Beckham	Gallinger	Norris	Sterling
Borah	Hughes	Page	Thomas
Brandegee	Husting	Poindexter	Thompson
Broussard	James	Reed	Vardaman

Chamberlain	Kern	Sheppard	Weeks
Clapp	Lane	Sherman	Works
Curtis	Lee, Md.	Shields
du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Fernald	Myers	Smith, Ga.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] through illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is unavoidably absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call discloses the presence of 45 Senators. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators; and Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. LODGE, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. GRONNA, Mr SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. STONE, and Mr. PHELAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. The roll call discloses that a quorum is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I must stand, I suppose, by the record, although an actual count does not disclose any more Senators present, I think, than were present when the call came for a quorum.

I was anxious, Mr. President, that there should be something approaching a quorum actually present when I laid before the Senate the reasons which the committee gave for striking out this appropriation of $72,000; and I think I shall simply have to discuss something else while waiting for the return of a real quorum—a quorum that will be persistent and lasting—before I take up that subject.

Mr. President, I think perhaps I can not better improve the waiting period than by reading from the last report of the Chief of the Children's Bureau upon the particular subject covered by these three lines at the top of page 143, where it is proposed to strike out an appropriation of $72,600 and suspend this work that is being done by the bureau at this time. Fortunately, the work had gotten far enough under way to justify itself, to attest its great value, to reflect the extraordinary executive ability of the head of this bureau.

It is well understood by the great woman who presides over this bureau what it was that Congress really wanted that bureau to accomplish; that it was not a technical, scientific investigation of this disease germ or that disease germ, but that it was what the law would indicate—an investigation of conditions of the very deepest concern to the Government and to the people of this country pertaining to child life. So these investigations have been prosecuted in a way to help out, measurably, the blundering work of Congress, and not duplicate anything that was being done by the Health Bureau, but to procure information that is essential to intelligent legislation in dealing with our great industrial problems.

While the investigation prosecuted by the head of the Children's Bureau has not been scientific in its character as medical science would understand and define the term, it is scientific from an economical standpoint; and that is the sort of science that Congress can best appreciate and that will be most useful to us in framing legislation.

Take, Mr. President, the work of the Children's Bureau on infant mortality. I pause just a moment to say that the fourth annual report of the Chief of the Childrens' Bureau for the fiscal year 1916, after the usual introductory paragraph, begins its information to the Secretary, and through the Secretary to Congress, with a somewhat detailed statement entitled "infant mortality inquiry and related work." That is on page 1 of this report.

Mr. President, I have in my hand the proceedings of the Senate of the United States on January 18, 1917. The RECORD of that date shows that we had but just reached this provision in the bill. The discussion was still in its first stages. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] had early taken the floor. The subject had first been introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and discussed through about a quarter of a column of the RECORD. Then the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] had taken the floor and, dividing the time with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], he occupied about a page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Then the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] addressed the Senate. But the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] had the floor, and he was endeavoring to lay before the Senate the real issue with regard to the striking out of this appropriation of $72,000 for the investigation of infant mortality. He had before him this report of that investigation, contained in the fourth annual report of the bureau. The infant-mortality section, which opens the report, is perhaps the most important thing in it, and takes up a couple of pages of the report; and the Senator from Iowa laid before the Senate some of the important facts developed from the investigation.

I happened to be in my place at the time. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], I suppose, as chairman of the subcommittee, seemed to be in charge of the bill upon this paragraph, as he had been upon others. At any rate, he was carrying for the time being the burden of the defense of the committee's recommendations. I was perfectly astounded, Mr. President, having read this report, sitting here in my place, to hear the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] make the statement which I am going to read to the Senate. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] was laying before the Senate some of these startling facts with respect to infant mortality and the causes thereof. This report of this great bureau opened with a condensed statement of the bureau's work upon that intensely vital subject in American life. The Senator from Iowa, concluding a statement upon the subject, using the facts of the report, said:

> In this country last year there were 300,000 babies under 1 year of age, as the statistics show, who died; one out of every eight of the babies born failed to reach 1 year of age. This bureau has investigated this question of infant mortality. That is one of the great features of the work that it has done. They went into Manchester, in the State of New Hampshire——
> Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that they are doing that work now?
>
> Mr. KENYON. They are doing that work now.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to state that it is my opinion that the work that is being done in Manchester, N. H., in investigating infant mortality could never be done under the city authority or under the State authority, because the strength of the textile mills in that locality is such that they would not permit it to be done properly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, Mr. President, I thank the Senator for that.

The power of the German Nation in this world war, Mr. President, the loyalty of the German people to that Nation, has amazed the world. It is not a Kaiser's war, so far as Germany is concerned, whatever we may think about it. One and all, as one people—socialists who hate the name of war, imperialists, agrarians, clerics—all are ready to go into the trenches of hell and death, and be buried there, for the German Government.

What does it signify? It means, sir, that they have a Government over there that takes care of the German people from birth to the time when they are enabled to enter the armies of the Kaiser. We are prone these days to complain of the American people because of our enlargement of the Regular Army that we can not get enlistments under the Old Flag. Our Navy is publishing in every center of population in America graphic pictures upon the billboards to induce enlistments in the Navy, and they are some 20,000 or more short. If there be any man on this floor who has addressed in campaigns gatherings of wage earners, and it has sometimes fallen to me to do it, he can not help, as I have, to have seen the difference with which the wage earners in this country responds to appeals to glorify our Government and the flag. Twenty-five years ago you could bring an audience of laboring men to their feet cheering for Old Glory and what it did for liberty, for freedom, for emancipation; but Mr. President, when you grind the faces of the poor, when you force the parents to put their children into the factories in order that they may exist, when you have little care for the death rate in the homes where the children of the poor are born, you are sowing the seed of a disregard and a resentment against this Government of professed equality for all that may bring upon us at some time that which we would most deprecate, which we would most of everything in life wish to put from us.

Mr. President, you can make no stronger appeal to the wage earners or to the Government, you can make no address upon patriotism which will so stir the hearts of the wage earners of the country as to let them know that our own Government, our good old Government, has some regard for them. They have had a little advance in wages, but while they were getting it they have seen the combinations of manufacturers advance the cost of living 100 per cent while they were getting 15 and 16 per cent advance in wages. They know perfectly well that this most progressive nation of all the world, this most inventive nation of all the world, is producing more cheaply to-day than ever before in the history of mankind. They know perfectly well, because they work with these machines that almost talk. They know perfectly well, sir, that the raw material is now seized by automatic hands, and that it passes from machine to machine with but a small fraction of the hand labor that was in it 25 years ago, and finally comes out, with the direction of a skilled workman here and there, a finished product at not 25 per cent the cost of hand labor of a quarter of a century ago. They know that. They do not require Senators and economists to teach them that; and they know perfectly well that with this enormous increase in the cost of living piled upon their bended backs they find it next to impossible to make income meet expenses.

Mr. President, if we are utterly indifferent to the conditions under which they live and work, if we are utterly indifferent about the climbing cost of living, if we are not concerning ourselves about anything except a few questions that are vital to property, what is the issue to be? I ran over this morning in the paper the President's program. One of the first things, which is pending before the committee of which I am a member, the Interstate Commerce Committee, is a bill to authorize exporters to make combinations in order to extend our foreign trade. There seems to be a profound concern everywhere that the producer should be taken care of. With the cost of living almost beyond the reach of people of considerable income, to say nothing about the poor, we are invited to concern ourselves about the further draining of production in this country in order that we may add a large export to the profit of those who are putting up the cost of living upon the consumers of America.

There seems to be a fatal blindness upon the part of all of us, and when the little opportunity is afforded by the expenditure of $72,000 to carry forward an investigation here that will tell the story of this awful mortality among the children of those who work for wages we find it opposed. When there is a little opportunity here to let the light into the homes of the toilers to know why it is that one out of every four babies of those who are earning $450 a year must die before they are 12 months old, it is to be blocked in the interests of economy.

It may be, Mr. President, that I am expressing undue feeling upon this matter. I am not entirely a novice in public affairs. I have spent almost my whole life in dealing with these questions, and I am constrained to believe that it behooves the statesmanship of this country to give consideration to these things that concern the millions of the toilers of our country.

Mr. President, what was this investigation with respect to infant mortality? Let us see. I am going to read from Miss Lathrop's report:

> The infant mortality inquiry is going forward—

Of course, she hoped it was going forward.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Surely.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator think that the investigation of infant mortality would cease unless this appropriation is made?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I think it will cease with this bureau, and this is the only bureau of the Government that is authorized by law to conduct it.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me say to the Senator that the appropriations carried in the bill now authorize it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; it does not authorize that.

Mr. BRYAN. The request from the chief of the bureau was not in the language in which the House bill stands. It was for the employment of 57 more clerks, and that is all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there is not any mistake about what the head of this bureau wanted. The head of this bureau appeared before the committees of Congress.

Mr. BRYAN. The bureau has been doing that work.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. She indicated what was needed. She has been doing this work within a limited field of two towns, and you apparently want to limit her to that field. I do not know whether there are many towns in the southern part of the country that the Senator or the other Senators from the South want to have shut out of this investigation, but if there are I do not believe that Congress will submit to it.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course the Senators from the South have as pure motives as the Senator from Wisconsin; that goes without saying; but I say that the people who are being employed will be limited not to two towns but to one town, the city of Washington, and that they will be sitting at clerks' desks here drawing a salary.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; the report shows plainly the contrary, and the statement made by the chief of this bureau before the Committee on Appropriations shows plainly the contrary. It shows that this appropriation is wanted for—

Field investigation.

Mr. President, it would almost appear that the members of the committee had never read the report.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator has read it. How many did she propose to send into the field of these 57?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will come to that if the Senator will content himself and let me pursue my argument in my own way. Here, listen to this. The Senator from Iowa had just said on the floor of this body:

In this country last year there were 300,000 babies under 1 year of age, as the statistics show, who died; one out of every eight of the babies born failed to reach 1 year of age. This bureau has investigated this question of infant mortality. That is one of the great features of the work that it has done. They went into Manchester, in the State of New Hampshire——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that they are doing that work now?

Mr. President, here is the report. It shows that they are doing that work now, and the chief of the bureau, backed by the Secretary of Labor, as I will show presently, gave the committees of both Houses to understand that it was tremendously important that they should prosecute that work, continue it, go on with it, and this appropriation of $72,000 was for that purpose and no other.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], replying to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], said:

Mr. KENYON. They are doing that work now.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of investigating the question of infant mortality?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly; and if the Senator had read the last report of Miss Lathrop he would have seen that she set out instances where they have made these investigations.

Mr. KENYON. Will it both the Senator if I suggest that the Senators, apparently, on the Appropriations Committee, the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Florida, who seem to have charge of the matter of cutting this appropriation, both voted against the establishment of this bureau and both voted against the child-labor act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; it would not disturb me, because it would not surprise me.

Mr. President, no man on this floor likes to call for or suggest the absence of a quorum, and I am not going to do it when I am speaking, but there are just 17 Senators present. When we come to vote on the question whether this appropriation of $72,000 shall be retained or not, it would not be at all strange if 20 or 30 Senators, enough to make a majority against the appropriation, should stroll in about that time in order to have a record of this matter, and should vote against the appropriation, and when asked about it should say, Oh, well, they were present the other day and got some smattering of the discussion that was going, and understood that the Children's Bureau was duplicating unlawfully work that ought to be performed by other bureaus. Mr. President, that is an unfortunate condition. If legislation can be disposed of—and it is often, as we all know—in that way, I do not know that there is any remedy for it. But, Mr. President, I am going to give to the few Senators who are here the reasons assigned by this committee for cutting this appropriation of $72,000 to prosecute the investigation of infant mortality out of the bill. In the hope that another Senator or two may straggle in I am tempted to give the few Senators who are here a little idea of this report.

The infant mortality inquiry is going forward, and the reports upon the different communities studied are in various stages of progress.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] had not heard that or he never would have said:

Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that they are doing that work now?

That is, prosecuting this investigation of infant mortality. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] said:

They are doing that work now.

The Senator from North Carolina replied:

Of investigating the question of infant mortality?

Here is the report.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Surely.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator has misinterpreted the question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Perhaps so.

Mr. OVERMAN. I meant to say they are doing that work; that the appropriation we originally gave was for that purpose, and we gave them the same appropriation exactly that they have now. It was my idea that they are now investigating the very thing the bill provides for, and it was our purpose, instead of increasing the appropriation for all the departments, to hold them down to practically the same appropriations they had last year. That was the purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yet the Senator seemed surprised with the statement that they were prosecuting that investigation, for he said:

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that they are doing that work now?

Mr. KENYON. They are doing that work now.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of investigating the question of infant mortality?

If the Senator had read the last report of Miss Lathrop, he would have seen that she set out instances where they have made this investigation.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood that, but I wanted to impress on the Senate the purpose of cutting down the appropriation, that they had money to do that work now and were doing the work now, because I knew it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to be perfectly fair. Can that work be done too rapidly when it shows as far as it is done that one baby out of four dies before it reaches the age of 12 months?

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think that an appropriation of $72,000 is a drop in the bucket to do that work. I think it will take hundreds of thousands of dollars to do it. The question in our minds was not to cripple the work of the bureau, but at this particular time in the appropriation bill to treat all alike. Here was the State Department, here was the Treasury Department; in other words, there were estimates for $42,000,000. We held them down to last year's appropriations. We kept down not only the appropriations for this department, but every other department.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; there are some departments here the appropriations for which have been increased in this appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the main we cut them down. The Census Bureau is the only one which has any considerable amount of increase.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There are new offices created here with salaries of $5,000 or $6,000 a year, while this investigation, taking $72,000, can not go ahead on account of the condition of the Treasury. We do not hesitate about passing river and harbor appropriation bills, or if we do we finally put them through; and there is the public-building bill of $35,000,000 on its way over here. I wonder how many members of the Committee on Appropriations will stand up here and fight against the expenditure of $35,000,000 for public buildings this year. I wonder how many members of this committee took that stand when more than $400,000,000 was added to the military and naval program of a year ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. Here is one who voted against it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad you did. It is a record of which you will be proud hereafter.

Now, Mr. President, let us see about this investigation; how important it is.

The infant-mortality inquiry is going forward, and the reports upon the different communities studied are in various stages of progress. Field study has been completed in all the towns mentioned in the third annual report and has been begun in Baltimore. The study of Baltimore was undertaken because of its representative character, and because its size affords an opportunity to compare the figures for a large city with those of the smaller cities heretofore included in the inquiry. The field work alone in Baltimore will require at least a year's time.

INFANT MORTALITY—MANCHESTER.

The findings of the bureau's earlier study in Johnstown, Pa., are confirmed in many respects by the findings in Manchester—the coincidence of a high infant-mortality rate with low earnings, poor housing, mother's work, and large families.

Now, Mr. President, just bear in mind, and let the RECORD show in this connection, the statement made by the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. The investigation by this bureau in Manchester, N. H., a textile town, which conveys a lesson to the American people, can be made, and made only, by this Federal bureau, on the authority of the distinguished junior Senator from New Hampshire. I wonder if the Senator duly appreciated the statement made by the junior Senator from New Hampshire. As I remember, he said it is a textile town, and that influences there were potential enough to prevent an investigation into the death rate among the babies of the employees in the textile industries, either a municipal investigation or a State investigation. Oh, sir, think of that. Why is that so? The Senate is to believe it. It is given to us on the authority of a Senator as highly thought of by its membership as any man on this floor. He tells you that there are potential forces that would baffle and prevent an investigation into the death rate of babies in that textile manufacturing town either by the State of New Hampshire or by the municipal government of Manchester. Oh, sir, that fact cries aloud to heaven for this appropriation. Shall this country be denied the information, denied the facts which are to be learned from a study—a critical, dispassionate study—of conditions in a manufacturing center of the United States, conditions that have to do with the future of the human race under our flag?

Mr. President, it is possible, if I read another paragraph or two here, that it would let in a flood of light upon the statement made by the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. If there is a power in Manchester, N. H., great enough to suppress an investigation into industrial conditions affecting the life of the families of the workers in the textile factories in that town, conducted by the municipal government, aye, more than that, which is strong enough to stay the arm of the State should it undertake the investigation, then, Mr. President, there must be some powerful reason why that is so. Why is it that that mighty power there wants to suppress and to cover up these facts?

Now, let us see. Fortunately, this Children's Bureau made a little start on this subject under the appropriation of last year. The superintendent of the bureau could not go into Massachusetts and Connecticut or into 20 or 30 other States, but she picked out and she made an investigation in Johnstown, Pa. Then this bureau took up this investigation in Manchester. Mr. President, it is all to the credit of the bureau and its chief that it does its work thoroughly; it is no sloughing over of the facts; it gets basic information. In this town of Manchester what did it discover? What was the result of this investigation?

> The findings of the bureau's earlier study in Johnstown, Pa., are confirmed in many respects by the findings in Manchester—the coincidence of a high infant-mortality rate, with low earnings, poor housing, mother's work, and large families.

That is what the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], with his professional knowledge, would expect; but that is a matter that the Members of this body generally would not have much judgment about, except for the fortunate circumstance that we have some accurate statements on the subject. Now, listen—I am dealing with Manchester, N. H.—

> The mortality rate among the 1,564 live-born babies studied in Manchester was 165 per 1,000 births, which is considerably higher than the estimated rate for the whole country.

You see, the whole country, based upon the census statistics, shows a death rate for the first year of 1 to 8, but—

> The mortality rate among the 1,564 live-born babies studied in Manchester was 165 per 1,000 births, which is considerably higher than the estimated rate for the whole country.

Now, listen:

> Manchester is primarily a textile town, and the textile mills employed 36.3 per cent of all the fathers of babies born in Manchester during the 12 months covered by the study.

Now, listen:

> Of the fathers, 13.7 per cent were earning less than $450 per year; 48.5 per cent less than $650; 22.9 per cent, $850 or more; 6.4 per cent, $1,250 or more.

Now, let us get the related facts of the death rate to the earnings of the fathers of these 1,564 live-born babies:

> Of the babies with fathers earning less than $450, about 1 in 4 died before it was 12 months old. The great majority of the babies had fathers in the wage group from $450 to $849, and of these about 1 in 6 died. Of the babies whose fathers earned $850 but less than $1,050, 1 in 8 failed to survive. Where the fathers earned $1,050 or more, 1 baby in 16 died in the first year.

Mr. President, is it unjust, is it unreasonable, can it possibly wrong anybody, to suggest that the relation between the death rate and the wages might possibly have something to do with the influences of the powers in this textile town that would prevent an investigation by the municipal government or by the State of New Hampshire? Oh, sir, does not the Senate begin to see that if these facts are of vital concern to the people of the United States, to our Government, to the perpetuation of the life of the race, the work has got to be done by the Federal Government; that these powerful local influences will be such that otherwise it can not be done at all? The junior Senator from New Hampshire conferred upon the Senate and the country and this great issue a very important statement of facts when he made the announcement here on the floor of the Senate during this debate that the only way that this investigation into the relation between poor housing, large families, and poor wages and the high death rate of the children of these people can be made at all is by the Federal Government.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. In order that the Senate may not think I made that statement lightly, I will add that a few years ago—perhaps five or six years ago—the textile mills in Manchester were openly and flagrantly violating the child-labor law. I was then a Democrat, as I now am. The superintendent of public instruction was a Republican. He was charged with the enforcement of the child-labor law by statute. He came to me and informed me of the situation in Manchester. He asked me if I would undertake to prosecute the violations of the child-labor law. I did not want to do it, for I thought it would be considered officious on my part, because I did not live in that county; but the superintendent urged me to do it, saying that he could not get anybody in the county to prosecute the cases; that he could not get anyone in his own party to do so, because the textile industries were so powerful in his own party. He appealed to me as a citizen of New Hampshire to support him in his effort to enforce the child-labor law in Manchester. Answering his appeal, one that I could not refuse when put in that way, I did prosecute those cases, secured convictions, and got the children out of the mills. I had one of my partners look up the facts, and in doing so he had to go among the homes of the children to ascertain how old they were. The reports that he brought to me of the way that those families lived were heartrending.

I therefore make this statement because I know of the conditions that have existed and the power of the corporations. I was not at first able to get convictions, because the judge of the police court before whom they were tried was under the influence of the owners of the textile mills. I announced that to him in his own court, and told him that if he did not do justice I should go over his head to the attorney general and secure informations. The next batch of cases I brought he decided properly, and convictions were secured.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am very glad that I dwelt upon this subject until the junior Senator from New Hampshire felt compelled to make this explanation, which I have no doubt is reluctantly made because of his own personal participation in the work of securing public justice; but I think it is a valuable contribution to this discussion, and I am glad to have it spread upon the RECORD here.

I need not say, Mr. President, that it is a high testimonial of the standard of public service and of the duties of citizenship, independent of public office, which every man owes to his community and to his country, but which all of us acquainted with the character of the junior Senator from New Hampshire would expect of a man of his high ideals.

Now, Mr. President, I lay before the Senate a little more of the details of this valuable report to show the thoroughness with which the investigation has been conducted; but they show also that the investigation is not one encroaching upon that prosecuted by the Public Health Service, which—and I use the term as applied to medicine—is technical and scientific. This is an investigation of the economic values and the economic bearings of all the facts which it discloses. It stands by itself; it has not any counterpart or duplicate in any of the investigations as to infant mortality prosecuted by any other Government agencies:

> Where families lived two or more persons per room, the infant death rate was twice as high as where they lived less than one person per room. The babies living in houses occupied by a single family died at the rate of 86.1 per 1,000, but those in tenements occupied by more than six families died at the rate of 236.6 per 1,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator is quoting from the report in relation to Manchester?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. All this portion of the report is devoted to the results of investigations in Manchester, and it is most vitally interesting.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was merely wondering why in Manchester as many as six families live in one tenement. That is what astonished me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. I know something of the cities of the Senator's State, and I can state that it would contrast very markedly with the conditions existing in the manufacturing towns of North Carolina.

When the mother was a wage earner the baby's chances of living were less than when she was not. Babies of mothers who had worked at some time during the year before the baby's birth died at the rate of 199.2 per 1,000, while babies of nonworking mothers died at the rate of 133.9. Babies of mothers employed away from home some time during the year after childbirth while the baby was still alive and under 4 months old had a rate of 277.3, while babies of mothers not employed during that time had a rate of 122.

Babies of foreign-born mothers did not fare so well as babies of native mothers. The differences of rates, however, are only partly accounted for by their lower earnings. The largest foreign element in Manchester is Canadian French, and among them the infant mortality rate, 224 per 1,000 live births, is greater than that among any other group of the population, although their earnings are in general higher than those of other foreigners.

I read that paragraph to show that this is no partial investigation in the interest of some propaganda, but here we find a thoroughgoing, able investigator directing this work in the interest of truth.

Sheer size of family appears to be one factor in this high Canadian-French rate, one-third of their babies being sixth or later in order of birth, while over one-sixth of these mothers had had from 9 to 18 children. These Canadian-French babies in families of 6 or more children died at the rate of 246.2 per 1,000 and the rate rises to 277.2 per 1,000 when only babies ninth or later in order of birth are considered.

Less important numerically in this nationality is the wage-earning mother. Comparatively fewer Canadian-French mothers than other foreign mothers are gainfully employed. The percentages of these wage-earning Canadian-French mothers at work outside the home and in the home varied slightly during the two years, but there is among the working mothers a stronger tendency on the part of the Canadian French to work outside the home after the baby's birth than appears among other foreigners. It is not surprising, therefore, to find that artificial feeding is more prevalent among Canadian French than in any other group of the population, and this prevalence appears to be one of the important factors in the high infant mortality rate among Canadian-French babies as compared with the rate for babies of other nationalities.

Mr. President, I have taken the time of the Senate to read from the report what there is under that caption into the RECORD. It is vitally important in its facts, and it is important in the aspect of informing the Senate of the character of the work this bureau is doing. It is high-class work; it is work the value of which can not be overstated. We may not be able to meet this problem at once by an intelligent dealing with it in legislation, but the immediate value of this work will be its educational importance to the mothers, the homes, and those communities that are most deeply concerned, for, after all, Mr. President, in the long run that which is beneficial to the members of a given community is beneficial to the community as a whole, and by a widespread propaganda and publicity of the information obtained by these thorough-going investigations, we will probably attain the first valuable results in the communities themselves by arousing a public spirit and stimulating a public opinion which will work for the protection of the community.

Now, Mr. President, I turn aside for a moment from this report.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the Senator leaves that branch of the subject, will he allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I sent for the report of this bureau, which has been distributed since this debate began. The Senator seemed to think that I had not read it. Of course, I did not have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suppose not.

Now, Mr. President, the reason assigned by one of the members of this committee for striking out this appropriation was that it was a duplication of work performed by another bureau, and therefore in the interest of economy it ought not to be extended, but the appropriation of $72,000 asked for for continuing the work should be cut out.

As authority for the action of the committee the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], a member of the committee, read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the testimony of Mr. Wood, of the Efficiency Bureau, and I want to present that to the Senate. Very few Members of the Senate were on the floor when that was read. We all of us have our obligations to our several committees; we have our special lines of investigation, which each of us is prosecuting as bearing upon national questions; and I appreciate the difficulties that Senators find in being present upon the floor of the Senate at all times during the consideration of bills. I know that I am perhaps as great a transgressor of that obligation, if it be an obligation, as any other Senator, or most other Senators, and I can only offer, Mr. President, the poor excuse of my personal conviction that I am better serving my constituency and better discharging my obligations to this body by prosecuting in my committee room or in the libraries of Congress investigations which have to do with legislation in this body. I think I may fairly say, without arrogating to myself anything that any other Member can not say as well, that I am not off this floor at any time unless it be that I am engaged upon work which concerns my duties here upon the floor.

But I know how it is with myself, and so it is, I suppose, with others. We come back to the Senate. A vote is imminent. Much of the discussion has transpired in our absence. We hurriedly confer with Senators in whose judgment we have confidence and who happen to be present, and they give us the best counsel they can. They may have been absent during a very important part of the discussion. Then we make our choice of sides upon the question that is to be voted upon, and vote according to our best information and our best judgment. I suppose many Senators will come upon the floor when the vote comes upon this amendment, not having heard very much and not having read very much of the debate that pertains to this appropriation, and are likely to say to their associates here: "What do you think about it?" And they are very likely to be told: "Well, there has been some statement here that there is a lot of duplication, and it is a good time to economize, and I guess we had better vote against the appropriation."

I do not think I am overstating the lack of thoroughness of investigation that most questions are liable to receive at the hands of this body.

Mr. President, on page 143, in the first three lines, is this item:

To investigate and report upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially to investigate the questions of infant mortality, $72,120.

That is stricken out by this committee, and upon that Senators must vote either to retain it or to reject it.

I ask Senators to remember that the Children's Bureau is the only executive organization that is clothed by statute with specific authority to investigate that subject. And now I give the authority upon which one of the Senators based his reason for cutting out that appropriation, and I read what he said. I quote from the remarks of the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]:

Now, coming to the item stricken out of the bill at the top of page 143—an appropriation of $72,120 for the Children's Bureau to investigate and report upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially to investigate the questions of infant mortality—the reasons that induced the committee to strike that out, I think, can be best stated by reading from the House hearings the testimony of Mr. Wood, of the Efficiency Bureau. I will not read it all, but here is the situation which exists now. The Bureau of Health is engaged in this same kind of work.

Those three lines relate only to the investigation of "the welfare of children and child life, * * * especially * * * the questions of infant mortality"; and the report shows that that is what is going on.

The Senator from Florida says:

The Bureau of Labor is engaged in the same sort of work. For instance, under the heading "Field investigations," in the Bureau of Health, I find the following:

"For investigations of diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, including sanitation, etc., $250,000."

That is the end of the quotation. Then the Senator says:

That is in the sundry civil bill of last year. In this very bill, on page 102, we find the following:

"For investigation of rural education, industrial education, and school hygiene, including personal services in the District of Columbia, etc., $45,000."

Then there is an appropriation in the Bureau of Education.

Have you got anything so far, Senators, that seems to conflict with the investigations of infant mortality?

The Senator from Florida proceeds:

Here is what is said by this member of this board that has been directed to investigate duplication of work in these various bureaus and departments:

Now, mark you, a moment ago he said:

The reasons that induced the committee to strike that out, I think, can be best stated by reading from the House hearings the testimony of Mr. Wood, of the Efficiency Bureau.

And now he says:

Here is what is said by this member of this board that has been directed to investigate duplication of work in these various bureaus and departments.

Mr. GOOD—

These are evidently from the House hearings, and Mr. GOOD, a Member of the House, is asking questions of Mr. Wood, of the Efficiency Bureau—

Mr. GOOD. I have noticed that the Department of Labor published last year Bulletin No. 162, Vocational Education Survey of Richmond, Va. The Bureau of Education is publishing a similar work of that kind. Have you investigated duplication of that kind?

Vocational education!

Mr. WOOD. We have examined the publications of the departments for the past year——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire from what page the Senator is reading?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am reading from page 1789 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. KENYON. Not from the report itself?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I am reading just what the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] read to the Senate as the reason for the action of the committee.

Mr. WOOD. We have examined the publications of the departments for the past year and found many places where, if there was no real duplication, there was at least an overlapping of functions. For example, the Bureau of Education and Health Bureau are both pursuing studies of school hygiene, though not in the same districts. Each is doing work that might be done by the other. Similarly, the Children's Bureau and the Health Bureau both publish bulletins on the care of babies.

It does not say that they are similar bulletins, or that they deal with a similar subject. Is that the sort of discrimination that this committee brought to bear in order to determine whether it would cut out this appropriation of $72,000?

Mr. GOOD. That necessitates the keeping in two or more separate bureaus the same character of employees that ought to do the work in one bureau?

Mr. WOOD. The trouble seems to be that the authorizations given to the different bureaus cross or overlap.

That is the fault of Congress.

For example, the Children's Bureau is authorized to investigate anything pertaining to children.

Now, that is not very accurate for an investigator of efficiency, or for a member of this bureau. It is limited by special phrases. But let that go.

That includes children's health and education and various other matters. The Health Bureau is authorized to investigate health, whether of children or adults.

Now, the Senator from Florida makes this comment:

I have just shown that they have a quarter of a million dollars for that.

That is, the Health Bureau has a quarter of a million dollars for investigating the diseases that pertain to man. Now listen further.

Mr. Wood, continuing:

The Bureau of Education is authorized to investigate questions pertaining to education. Again, the Labor Bureau has always concerned itself with health insurance among laboring men. The Bureau of Public Health has recently taken up health insurance as a health measure. Both have issued publications on that subject.

Mr. GOOD. You have not gone into that?

Now, he sums it all up:

Mr. WOOD. We have made a partial list of cases in which different bureau seem to cover the same field—

This expert on efficiency does not pretend to know that they do cover the same field.

We have made a partial list of cases in which different bureaus seem to cover the same field, but we came to the conclusion that it would be better to get every bureau to report to us every job it is working on, to index those jobs so that all relating to health would fall in one place, all relating to children in another, etc., and then to go carefully through the index, make note of cases in which there is duplication or overlapping, and bring them first to the attention of the various bureaus in order to get their statements of the case and then to the attention of Congress. We hope to do that by the next Congress.

But this committee, forestalling that work which a real investigator plainly showed was necessary to be done before they tampered with the work of any bureau, has seen fit to strike out of this appropriation this provision for the investigation of infant mortality.

There is all that the Senator from Florida read from this expert. I submit to the Senate that the conclusions of the expert ought to have bound the Senate committee; and if the expert was not willing to say that the work of a given bureau was not such a duplication that it was a waste of the public money and recommended its discontinuance, then, sir, the committee, in the discharge of its obligation as the arm of Congress carrying out the will of Congress as expressed in legislation which delegated to this bureau the investigation of infant mortality, should not have stricken out this appropriation.

But, sir, the committee further supports its action by quoting from the Secretary of Labor, the superior of the head of this Children's Bureau; and it must have impressed the Senate, or those Senators who listened to it, as almost decisive of this case—I refer to what was read from the report of Secretary Wilson, within whose department is this Children's Bureau—for he spoke of duplication of these various bureaus. He deprecated the confusion that results from the overlapping authorizations by Congress; and he said in his report—not only that portion of it which was read here, but elsewhere, for I have studied the report—that the solution of it immediately was the bringing together of these different arms in the administration of the law by the executive departments and seeing that they did not duplicate the work that Congress had authorized them to duplicate, if the authorizations were to be carried out.

But, Mr. President, in writing his general criticism upon this subject the Secretary of Labor was not writing with reference to the Children's Bureau, or to its investigation of infant mortality. Now, I purpose to read what the Secretary said, as stated by the Senator from Florida. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and then, Mr. President, I will follow that by reading from a statement which I have received from Secretary Wilson on the subject of duplication as applied to this particular work and to this particular item which this committee has stricken out of the bill. If he be an authority for the committee to quote, they will surely accept him as eminently satisfactory when it comes to the specific thing under investigation here.

But to get before the Senate again in this connection the statement of the committee, as presented by a member of that committee, of the reasons which moved it, I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 19, 1917. There was a running discussion as to duplication between the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. The Senator from Florida, reading from the report of the Secretary, on page 1857, says—and it is the first that I can find here that he did read from the report of the Secretary—

The law creating the Department of Labor provides—

"That the Secretary of Labor shall investigate and report to Congress a plan of coordination of the activities, duties, and powers of the office of the Secretary of Labor with the activities, duties, and powers of the present bureaus, commissions, and departments, so far as they relate to labor and its conditions, in order to harmonize and unify such activities, duties, and powers, with a view to further legislation to further define the duties and powers of such Department of Labor."

Then the Senator comments as follows:

Here is a letter from the Secretary of Labor dated January 9, 1917, in which department the bureau is located, from which I quote to the Senator this paragraph:

"Another relationship, somewhat along the same line, exists with reference to the parallel activities of the Public Health Service and the Children's Bureau. The nature of this overlapping in the same fields of endeavor is of such a character that there is practically no limit to the duplication and resultant likelihood of confusion, unless there is complete and harmonious adjustment of the respective activities."

That is as far as the quotation extends until you come to page 1859, when the Senator continued his reading from the Secretary, as follows:

Mr. BRYAN. Let us see. I will read a little further from what the Secretary says. By the way, it develops another duplication when we come to read it. He says:

"One instance of distinct overlapping occurs in reference to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. This circumstance appears to be due to the broad authority vested in the Public Health Service to investigate the 'diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof' (act approved Aug. 14, 1912; 37 Stat., 309). As the Bureau of Labor Statistics is charged with acquiring and diffusing useful information upon subjects connected with labor (act approved June 13, 1888; 25 Stat., 182), and as information regarding occupational diseases and the conditions influencing their propagation is clearly a subject connected with labor as well as with the general classification of the 'diseases of man,' the Bureau of Labor Statistics of this department and the Public Health Service of the Treasury Department are charged, at least to this extent, with similar duties. In order to prevent confusion and duplication of effort, coordination of the functions of these two branches of the public service should, in so far as they may overlap, be effected and consistently adhered to.

"The field of occupational diseases was occupied during a period of about seven years prior to 1912 by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, through its investigations into the hygienic conditions of cotton mills; of home work; of ventilation and general sanitary conditions of clothing shops; of diseases in the glass industry; of health of women in textile factories and laundries; of poisons in the industries; of tuberculosis among wage earners; of the health of wage-earning women in the pea canneries; of the hygiene of the painters' trade; of anthrax as an occupational disease, etc.

"Since 1912 the Public Health Service has carried its function with reference to the diseases of man into the field of occupational diseases. It can not be conducive to the good of the service in general to have two such Government establishments occupying identically the same field at one and the same time—"

Nobody can quarrel with that criticism or observation, Mr. President. Everybody must agree to that. The difficulty is that Congress is responsible for this overlapping direction, and, as suggested by the Secretary, the different governmental activities have been obliged to protect themselves against squandering the public money by seeking, in so far as they could by conference, to limit the overlapping work and prevent duplication. He is making a general statement now, and says:

It can not be conducive to the good of the service in general to have two such Government establishments occupying identically the same field at one and the same time, and it would appear that in so far as the functions of the Public Health Service relate to labor and its conditions, as is the case with reference to occupational diseases, they should be correlated and coordinated with those of the Department of Labor. In their medical or scientific aspects occupational complaints should doubtless be within the field of the Public Health Service, but just as certainly they should be within the jurisdiction of the Department of Labor in their industrial bearing, this phase of the matter being popular rather than scientific, and tending to promote the welfare of the wage earners who are or may become subject to ailments peculiar to certain trades and occupations. The logical conclusion is that neither branch of the public service should be in absolute control with reference to investigating them and publishing the results. The concluding recommendation in this report will, if adopted, prevent any harmful overlapping of functions and result in the utilization to the fullest extent of all such information and data that may be gathered for scientific and other purposes, so far as the same is useful in its more popular aspects.

And now we come to this, and the Senator reads the concluding paragraph:

Now we come to this:

"Another relationship, somewhat along the same line, exists with reference to the parallel activities of the Public Health Service and the Children's Bureau. The nature of this overlapping in the same fields of endeavor is of such a character that there is pracically no limit to the duplication and resultant likelihood of confusion, unless there is complete and harmonious adjustment of the respective activities.

"Under the terms of the statute authorizing the establishment of the Children's Bureau (act approved Apr. 9, 1912, 37 Stat., 79) it is especially directed to investigate the questions of infant mortality, the birth rate, dangerous occupations, and accidents and diseases of children. The authority to investigate these same matters is likewise vested in the Public Health Service by the act approved August 14, 1912 (37 Stat., 309), which broadly covers the entire field under the term 'diseases of man.' As previously indicated in another connection, the function now under discussion is exercised by the Children's Bureau in a popular sense rather than from a medical or scientific viewpoint, but the means of attaining the respective ends necessarily lie along the same lines, and, as in the case of the contact between the Public Health Service and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and between the latter and the Children's Bureau, there should be absolute and positive means of preventing harmful overlapping of effort, and securing to all concerned the benefit of cooperative work in a movement which, up to a certain point, occupies a common field of investigation.

"Still another relationship of the Public Health Service to the Department of Labor is found in the work of medical inspection of aliens under the immigration laws (act approved Feb. 20, 1907, 34 Stat., 898, sec. 17)."

That is all that was read, Senators, by the committee as a justification for striking out of the bill the appropriation for investigating infant mortality as prescribed by the law which created the bureau. I submit there is not a word in what Secretary Wilson says that justifies a construction such as has been put upon it by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. President, if either of these bureaus ought to be curtailed, cut down, and denied the opportunity to investigate the subject of infant mortality, surely it ought not to have been the bureau that specifically by law is authorized to do that work.

Mr. President, thinking that I might be called upon to speak on this subject on Friday afternoon, and feeling certain that the quotation read from the Secretary of Labor was not fairly subject to any such construction as had been put upon it by the committee, I telephoned to the Secretary of Labor and asked him to advise me with respect to this matter of the duplication of work, and I received a telegram from him. It came to me after the Senate had adjourned on Friday. I will read it to the Senate just as I received it, and also read a letter from him which is just now laid upon my desk, which I have not had the opportunity to read and which came to my office since I have been speaking:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1917.

Hon. R. M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your inquiry, would say that there is no duplication of work in this department between the Children's Bureau and the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Mr. BRYAN. That is the Bureau of Labor Statistics?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; the Bureau of Labor Statistics. That is one of the things that was cited in the quotation.

Mr. BRYAN. No; the conflict or duplication is with the Public Health Service.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But you did not stop with that. You referred to the industrial statistics that were being gathered as being a duplication of something else that was being done.

Mr. BRYAN. I read from it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This will stand for itself in the RECORD against what I have read from the report as you gave it. I shall begin again, Mr. President, because I should like it to be consecutive.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1917.

Hon. R. M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your inquiry, would say that there is no duplication of work in this department between the Children's Bureau and the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Through a departmental arrangement, no study is undertaken by either bureau where their authorizations meet without consulting with the other, so that while there may be similarity in reports because of the closely related authorization there is no duplication of work, nor is there any duplication of work between the Children's Bureau and the Bureau of Health in the study of infantile mortality. The Children's Bureau is making intensive studies of infantile mortality from the standpoint of popularizing methods of prevention, and the investigations have not included school hygiene but have been dealing with children in their home life and home surroundings. Nor do I know of any duplication of this work by any other bureau of the Government. The Children's Bureau study of infant mortality is concerned with social and economic, not medical, factors. It in no way duplicates the work of the Public Health Service. Its purpose was fully explained to the Public Health Service when the bureau began operation in the autumn of 1912, and the head of the Public Health Service stated to the chief of the Children's Bureau that the inquiry upon the lines proposed was new and would be valuable, and that the Public Health Service had no purpose to undertake it. The Children's Bureau has cooperated with the Bureau of Education and the Public Health Service in a study of the feebleminded in Delaware. It has cooperated with the Census Bureau in carrying on a continuous campaign for better birth registration. It has cooperated with the Department of Agriculture by furnishing large numbers of publications on the care of children for circulation by the county agents of the Department of Agriculture.

The bureau's extended studies of child-welfare legislation, child-labor laws, and child-labor conditions, its reports upon mother's pension, birth registration, and baby-week campaigns are all in a field entirely its own. It has not overlapped. The Children's Bureau has been doing a splendid work in this line so far as its appropriation would permit, and I sincerely hope that Congress will grant the increase asked for in order that the work may be continued on a still more effective basis. It has been the policy of the department wherever there was a likelihood of authorizations overlapping, either within the department or with other departments, to consult with the departments interested in order to avoid so far as possible duplication, the result of which has been that, while the authorization of different bureaus may have overlapped, the work in the specific field of inquiry has not been duplicated.

W. B. WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. President, there has just been laid upon my desk the following memorandum. I may say that it is not volunteered by the Secretary. I brought to his attention this morning the discussion which had taken place on Thursday and Friday concerning this important item in the bill and asked him, urgently requested him, if he had anything supplemental to the telegram which he had sent me on Friday that I would be glad to receive it while the matter was still pending. There was laid upon my desk here just a moment ago the following, which I have not read but will read to the Senate:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 22, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Supplementing my telegram to you on Friday, I am inclosing you herewith memoranda relative to some elements of doubt expressed by several Senators in their discussion of the appropriation for the Children's Bureau.

I desire to reiterate the statement that this department has not undertaken an investigation or study of any subject under its jurisdiction that was likely to overlap the authorization of any other department or bureau of the Government without first consulting with the departments or bureaus interested and arranging to avoid duplication. The letter from which the Senator from Florida quotes includes the draft of a bill which seeks to enact into law the policies which this department has endeavored to put into practice by interdepartmental arrangement, and the clause which the Senator quotes simply asserts the possibility of duplication when mutual arrangement has not been entered into before the study is commenced.

Mr. President, it is entirely manifest that the matter quoted from here was written not with application to the subject directly under discussion here, but was written to enforce a recommendation of the Secretary for legislation that should prevent any duplication of authorizations by Congress. I repeat:

The letter from which the Senator from Florida quotes includes the draft of a bill which seeks to enact into law the policies which this department has endeavored to put into practice by interdepartmental arrangement, and the clause which the Senator quotes simply asserts the possibility of duplication when mutual arrangement has not been entered into before the study is commenced.

I know of no investigation or other work that has been undertaken by this department or any of its bureaus where the field had already been covered or was being covered by any other department or bureau of the Government.

Respectfully, yours, W. B. WILSON,
Secretary.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, I asked the Children's Bureau to send to my office just before I took the floor every publication, every report, every bulletin which it has. I have these in my office. I have not had an opportunity to look over these publications. I have here a memorandum with respect to these books, which I shall withhold until I have had a chance to look at them myself, and I shall not present them unless there should be occasion for further discussion of this subject upon my part. It may not be necessary for me to take the time of the Senate to present them. Let me say this: I looked at their titles; I glanced just at the introductions. I had in mind the law, and I never was more confident of any assertion that I made on the floor of the Senate in the 10 years that I have been a Member here than I am of this. There can be found no article, no publication, no bulletin, no report made by the Children's Bureau which is not made under the authority of the statute which created it or amendments thereof. They have kept so specifically and so exactly within the terms of the authorizations of Congress that that bureau is not and can not be subject to any fair criticism by anybody.

I thank the Senate for its attention.

Mr. LANE. Before the Senator from Wisconsin takes his seat I wish to call his attention to a case which occurred within half a mile of where we now stand, since the argument began upon this bill. About the time we took up this item a woman was found by some of her neighbors lying in bed, holding a baby a few days old, who had not had a bite to eat for three days, with no food in her house and no fuel with which to cook food if she had had it, nor to warm the premises. The baby was lying with her in bed, nursing a starving mother while her milk was drying in her breast, the baby to be stunted to that extent throughout life perhaps. Is there no need for a bureau to investigate conditions of that sort? There is no need to withhold this appropriation with the millions that are flooded down the line for useless expenditures.

There was another case near by where a woman with three children, who works for the Government for $20 a month, fainted on her way home the other day and had to be carried into a neighbor's house. For the children she had denied herself food. That is the work for which we need such a bureau as this. Children raised under those conditions become derelict adults, unfit to take care of themselves or to do the duty devolving upon them, or which should devolve upon them, in carrying on government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I promise to consume only a very short time, for I apprehend the Senate is anxious to get to a vote on this matter as speedily as possible.

The House Appropriations subcommittee in its hearings had presented to it an estimate by the Children's Bureau asking an appropriation of $173,400 in the first instance. This is the second item found on page 143 of the bill now before the Senate as it came from the other House. The House subcommittee—and subsequently by the action of the House in passing the bill it was approved—out of the $173,400 asked granted $95,000 for those items. In that form the bill came to the Senate, whose committee reported to cut the $95,000 down to $58,000, leaving it in the form in which it has been reported. The appropriation of $58,000 refers to various items of "traveling expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4," pay for interpreters, and various other lines of effort mentioned in that paragraph. The Senate committee has reported to cut the $95,000 allowed by the other House to $58,000. With this reduction I am not in sympathy. I believe the House appropriation of $95,000 ought to be restored. I believe it is as little as the efficient work of this branch of the bureau's service can be performed for.

As the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has fully covered the original act creating the bureau, I shall do no more than refer to it. The act under which this bureau was created imposes upon the head of the bureau and its subordinates the duty of investigating infant mortality. If the item, at the top of page 143, of $72,120 be stricken out in accordance with the recommendations of the committee in reporting the bill, it leaves just so much of the duty of this bureau incapable of performanee.

I assume that in the effort to economize these reductions have been made. This is an improper place for economy. If there is to be economy practiced in the committee or on the floor of the Senate, there are other and more fitting places on which that practice can be had. There is a multitude of public buildings, which have been frequently referred to here to-day, carrying many millions of dollars, in remote hamlets of little income and less importance, and which will be a fixed charge after the buildings shall have been erected, the maintenance cost of which will absorb a large portion of the postal receipts at those points, if not all of them. There is a river and harbor bill coming on apace, drawing with it the usual items from far and near, the meritorious being mixed with those that are without merit, aggregating many millions of dollars.

In addition to that, there is a great variety of other appropriations here on which we could well practice our economy. There is the usual mileage item presented through the legislative subdivision of this bill. There is $51,000 in a single item for the mileage of Senators; there is $175,000 in the mileage for Members of the other House, aggregating a total of $226,000, over a quarter of a million dollars of mileage on the 10-cent provision that remains from an ancient day when we traveled by stage coach or in some other more expensive way than the usual 2 cents or less per mile attendant upon the travel of public officials at this time. I only refer to those instances to show that items of economy have been overlooked that could properly be stricken out of the various appropriation bills.

In the act creating the bureau having charge of children and kindred subjects duties are imposed upon that bureau and its authority is defined at some length. Those duties can not be performed unless there are adequate appropriations to that end. For the investigation of infant mortality every dollar of appropriation is stricken out under the report of the committee. How can that duty be performed? The reply is that there would be duplication of other services; that other departments and other lines of governmental effort cover the service of this item of $72,120, which has been stricken out. I think the testimony offered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin on this point is pertinent and well nigh conclusive.

Among a good many other lines of work that the bureau performs is that of examining State laws, of examining the effect of local regulations upon the industrial and health conditions attendant on child labor and upon infants before they could even reach that age; upon the indexing of the laws and making them accessible to the general public, so that they will not be to that public a sealed book.

From Chicago comes a letter from S. C. Kingsley, which is found published in the hearings before the subcommittee of the other House. Sherman C. Kingsley, of Chicago, is a gentleman who is engaged in charitable and eleemosynary work. He has been in that business practically all his life. It was my fortune to be associated with him for four years in one branch of the service where some of my public duty came in contact with his. Mr. Kingsley is not given to spending money uselessly. He is reasonable in his expenditures, because the greater part of his activities have been under private charity, under the foundations created by a will, where great funds had been accumulated, which are administered upon strictly business principles, and where they cooperate in a practical way with the public charities of the State and of the General Government; in the administration of the affairs of these great foundations, the great bulk of which have to do with the large cities of this country, where a great part of the industrial problems have their origin; and in the course of his activities he has been able to inform himself concerning these matters. I only give this as explanatory of who S. C. Kingsley is. Addressing a letter to the head of the Children's Bureau, Miss Julia Lathrop, under date line "Chicago, Ill., November 21, 1916," he says:

MY DEAR MISS LATHROP: I thank you very much for your letter and for the index of Illinois laws relating to child welfare, which has been received. We are just getting fairly into the work here and begin to appreciate something of what it means to have a service of this kind rendered by the Federal Government. I am sure that this index will be of the greatest possible service. One can see at a glance that this kind of thing can not be done by a casual group or by an office that was not organized for the purpose.

About a week ago, Mr. President, an examination by medical authority of 86,000 school children in the city of Chicago was completed. These children had passed the infant stage, and, having reached school age, were found in the schools of that city. Of the 86,000 children, who were examined by competent medical authority, 29,000, nearly one-half, were found physically defective. According to the military records of various enlistment stations of this country, it is reported as the result of medical examinations that an unusually and dangerously large percentage of the applicants are rejected for physical defects. It is known that the public health is impaired; it is known that for some cause there are more physical defectives in the present generation of Americans than are either safe or necessary. Where shall we begin? A celebrated authority once said "Begin with the grandfather." We can not. In considering the mortality incident to infant life it is too late to begin with the grandfather; we can only take the little sparks of human life that have been sent into this world and that are entitled to their chance to live. We can begin with them; we can supervise their tiny lives; we can improve their surroundings; we can give the mother medical instruction, advice, and help; we can send into the hovel or into the humble home where the baby of yesterday is lying without care the information and the knowledge to the parents, however poor, that will give the infant the chance to live. We can do those things; but we can not turn back the hands of the clock to the grandfather's time.

For the 29,000 children examined in Chicago and found to be physically defective, we are responsible either in our State Government or here in this Capitol. When children reach the school age and are physically defective at that early time, while they are still growing, while their vitality is in the ascendency, it may fairly be inferred that if during the age of infancy, before they left the mother's bosom or the nursing bottle or the cradle, they had had proper care, as contemplated by this item of this bill, nearly half of the number examined would not have been physically defective.

We think we are a progressive people. We are progressing backwards. In this modern generation our people are eating finely bolted flour, canned vegetables, preserved meat, and food in tabloid form, unripe fruits or too little of any kind, with a careless diet, and large populations are gathering in great industrial centers in the mighty cities springing up on the continent, until we are rotting at the sources, and there is scarcely a physically perfect child 12 years of age to be found in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis, Kansas City, or any other of the large cities of our country. Their teeth are chalk, their nerves are destroyed, they are prematurely old, they are toothless at 20, they are hairless at 30, they are nervous wrecks at 40, and they are dead and forgotten at 50. Something is the matter. Let us begin with the babies we have got now, and take care, so far as our example and our ability go, of the generation to come, or the second one to come, reaching ahead by our example into the future the best we can by doing our duty now.

I was amused a few days ago when reading an article on eugenics, a news report by Mr. Stokes. I hesitate somewhat to give Mr. Stokes the publicity in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the item deserves, but Mr. Stokes in substance suggested the breeding of human beings as he has been raising horses. Well, with all due respect, there is a difference between a human being and a horse. A human being is supposed to be something besides mere body and beyond physical brawn. The provision under consideration here is not merely for the purpose of watching the physical health and to make some kind of a habitation for a healthy person in the future, but it is to give the foundation, so that there may be future training to some advantage.

The people that have gone a long way on eugenics remind me of the melancholy experience of Mr. Frankenstein. You will remember that Shelley, the poet Byron, and others—five of them altogether—agreed that they would each write an impossible story. It was to be wholly a product of the imagination. It was not to be based upon fact, but was to be based upon the ingenious theorizing of the author. They carried out the compact, and but one of the productions has survived—Frankenstein. The author succeeded in creating a mortal without the aid of the ordinary agencies. He was physically immune from disease, impervious to cold, tireless in his activities, without fatigue, a giant in muscle, and unconquerable in personal prowess and individual combat. He was ungovernable. The author created a perfect being physically, but without moral sensibilities or moral character, so he became a scourge and a curse and a menace to communities.

We are not seeking to do anything of the kind. We are seeking to preserve the physical body of the infant, not by a system of eugenics that will select the mate without regard to human affections, but to preserve the infant born under ordinary conditions and give it the physical body that may be the foundation of the character that is to govern that body in the years to come.

That is the purpose of the $72,120. It is to investigate infant mortality. The figures read by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] are unanswerable. The mortality investigated shows the cause of the mortality. Study the life-insurance tables—the American table of mortality or the early English table of mortality. One hundred thousand infants are taken, or 100,000 persons at a given age. How many live at the end of each twelve-months period? You get infant mortality in the same way. Out of the given number of infants, a thousand or ten thousand, each year so many are dead. As the indifference and neglect and sordid surroundings and careless living of the parent or guardian, the lack of sanitation in the home, increase, the infant mortality increases. Death reaps his harvest where there is the least known about how to take care of the child.

It is to stop that untimely harvest, the swath cut by infant diseases as it sweeps through the home of the humble, that this investigation is designed. Its purpose is humanitarian; its methods are practical; its results are certain; and for one, Mr. President, I shall vote to restore the House item. That is as far as we can go. We can not add to the House bill under present conditions; but we can at least, in the exercise of our right, restore the amount allowed by the House, which is entirely stricken out, on this subject of infant mortality and partially stricken out on the other expenses incident to this branch of the public service.

I do not care to take further time, Mr. President. Although it is an inviting subject, and one that leads to the investigation of a great many things of an economic character, of humanitarian consideration, and of the administration of both public and private charity, I forbear by reason of lack of time, leaving to some more opportune occasion the pursuit of other branches of this subject, which are multitudinous in character and vital in their ultimate consequences.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to delay action upon this amendment. I should be false to myself, however, if I did not enter a protest against the attempted action of the committee.

I think we have had or will have before us few matters equaling in importance this question. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has well said that we can not begin with the grandfather; but we can to-day, by beginning with the infant, deal with the grandfather of the generations to come.

There can be no question in free government so vital as the upbuilding of the citizen. It has been urged here that we need a strong childhood from which to develop a strong manhood; that we may have the manhood essential upon the field of battle. But, Mr. President, in a republic we need a patriot behind and preceding the soldier; and we can not develop that love of our institutions, that character essential to the highest ideals of citizenship, if we begin with a weak and degenerate physical condition of the child. So that while we need the strong, if we ever do, upon the field of battle, we need the strong still more back of the soldier himself. No nation ever went down on the field of battle until the seeds of weakness and decay had been sown in the citizenship.

Mr. President, I would go one step further with this appropriation. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] this afternoon has portrayed in most graphic manner a lessening appreciation—and it is becoming more and more evident every day in this land—of the value and the spirit of our institutions among those who find the struggle of life a hard struggle. We owe them something, not alone in relieving their physical distress, but in building up in their hearts and minds a love for the institutions under which they live. When we squander hundreds of millions preparing to do battle, on the theory that the graveyards of Europe will give up their dead to stand in battle array, it is no wonder that these upon whom rests the burden of the industrial life of our country come to a lessened appreciation of the spirit of our institutions.

Mr. President, to my mind there is but one excuse on earth for free government, and that is that in the association thus formed those who form the association may gain in material and moral welfare; and government owes a duty to its citizens to inspire in them a confidence and respect for their institutions.

It is said that this is providing more clerks than may be needed for this bureau. I am not certain upon that point one way or the other; but I believe it is unfortunate that the committee takes this point as the point from which to project a system of economy in the appropriations of this Congress, dealing with this great problem, dealing with humanity, dealing with the question of building up in the minds of our people a love and reverence for our institutions. I believe that we can well afford to take the chances upon the possibility that we may provide here for a few more clerks than will be absolutely necessary; and it seems to me that taking this broader view of the situation it is unfortunate indeed that the committee has recommended the striking out of this small item put in the bill by the House.

I did not intend, and do not intend now, to trespass on the time of the Senate. I simply wanted to deal with this broader phase of the subject.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I shall not reply to many of the things said by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. They are matters in which the Senate is not concerned. The Senate is not concerned with entering into the question of the motives of individual Senators. Neither do I believe that the Senators who have discussed this question understand what is involved.

I concede that the gentleman who offered the amendment in the House was very shrewd in the language given to his amendment. The head of this bureau did not ask for any money to investigate the subject of infant mortality. That question was not mentioned in the official estimates that came to the House committee; neither was it involved in the language of the bill that was submitted when it was before the House committee.

Let me say right here that it is rather a strange proceeding for the heads of these bureaus to have their hearings before the House committee, get a part of the increase they desire, and then turn in against the committee before the House membership and get some more; then come to the Senate committee and plead for more, and if they get it, pocket that, and then come to the Senate and fight the Senate committee.

They did not ask for any money to investigate the subject of infant mortality. That idea came as a bright thought from some Member of the House who offered this amendment. Here is what they asked for, and the way it would have read if the money asked for by the head of this department had been granted by the House Committee:

Chief of [the Children's] bureau, $5,000; assistant chief of bureau, $4,000; experts—1 on sanitation, $2,800; 1 industrial, $2,000; 1 social service, $2,000; 1 librarian, $2,000; 1 statistical, $2,000; 1 research, $2,000; special agents—1 at $1,800, 4 at $1,600 each, 15 at $1,400 each, 20 at $1,200 each; private secretary to chief of bureau, $1,500; clerks—1 administrative, $2,000, 5 of class 4, 8 of class 3, 11 of class 2, 25 of class 1, 27 at $1,000 each; 5 copyists; messenger; and assistant messenger; in all, $178,760.

In other words, they asked for nothing more than an increase in the clerical force amounting to 57 individuals; they asked to increase their annual appropriation from $100,000 to $178,760; and the House committee and the Senate committee declined to do it.

"Ah," say the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and other Senators, "but we might have found some other place to economize." The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] points out that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] voted against the bill creating the Children's Bureau when it was established. Yes; I voted against it on the ground that it was unnecessary; that there were bureaus enough. Now it develops that the bureaus are doing the work two or three times over, and I believe I was justified in it.

The Senator points out also that I voted against the child-labor bill. So I did. He and I both had grave doubts about its constitutionality. He said he had, and I said I had. In that situation I thought I ought not to vote for it, and the Senator from Iowa thought he was permitted, under his oath, to vote for it.

Mr. President, this is not the only bureau that did not get what it asked for. It was given the same appropriation that it had last year. Every other bureau was treated in about the same way.

The Library of Congress asked for 43 more clerks—less numbers—and got only 1, I believe.

The Civil Service Commission asked for 10 more clerks at a cost of $12,490. They were not allowed. Does it, therefore, follow that the Committee on Appropriations is trying to put the Civil Service Commission out of business?

The Department of State asked for an appropriation of $15,000 for emergency clerical service on account of the Mexican situation. The committee did not give it to them. Does that justify any Senator from any State in impugning the motives of any committee?

The Secretary of the Treasury asked for some increases for his department. I voted for an assistant to the Secretary, because I think he is almost compelled to have one because of the added work placed upon him. Some Senator raised the point of order here, and it went out. He asked for two more clerks and some more appropriations, and they were not allowed. In the Treasury Department I find, again, that they asked for 64 clerks. The Treasury Department is a great department. They were not asking for any more increase of clerks in the whole department than are asked for here in one bureau. Is not the Treasury Department an important department of this Government? We thought they could get along without it, however, and we did not increase their appropriation.

In the Office of the Coast Guard they needed five clerks, at a cost of $6,000. They were not allowed. I shall not take time to go through all the list. The same thing was true of the War Department, the Navy Department, the Interior Department, the Department of Justice, and the Department of Commerce. All the departments of the Government, including the bureaus therein, seemed to be satisfied, except one bureau in the Department of Labor, because we treated them all alike, and because the committee was trying to carry out the mandate of the Democrats, at least in this body. We have had here for three hours speeches pointing out that the committee has refused to allow these people to continue the work upon infant mortality when they have the same amount of money for the next year that they have had for this year.

The Secretary of Labor, who, in pursuance of an act of Congress, wrote this letter January 9, sends to the Senator from Wisconsin a telegram on the 19th of January. I shall not undertake to say what he meant. If the Secretary can himself write this on the 9th and say what he said to the Senator on the 19th and make them harmonize, that is for him. The Senator from Wisconsin could not do it.

Mr. President, we left all the departments, so far as I am able to recall, with the same clerical force they have this year. There was a recommendation for one increase for the Secretary of the Treasury and that went out on a point of order. It is not fair, it is not just, it is not true to charge the Senate committee with undertaking to discriminate against one particular bureau. I think it speaks better for the rest of them that they submit, while the head of this bureau, or somebody connected with it, holds the Senate up here for days, appealing to the Senate on the theory and with the implied charge that the committee were following them up and trying to punish them and starving them to death. The committee had no such idea. The committee thought that with what they had allowed they could get along. The committee thought within the next year, in pursuance of the authority partially granted them and in pursuance of the authority that will be asked for in this bill, we can cut out this duplication. The report can be published now by the Health Service and by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and that bureau can continue on as it is. We thought that the reports should be made without at this time doubling the clerical force of the Children's Bureau.

Many pictures have been printed here to-day, Mr. President, of conditions in various parts of the country. Most of them can not be cured by learned pamphlets on infant mortality. These people would sit at desks in this city and write learned pamphlets and send them to the boards of health of States that have a superior force and know more about what they are doing then these people when they try to tell them.

I am ready for a vote, so far as I am concerned. I shall not take up the time of the Senate in answering any three or four hours' speech, which is an attack upon the Committee on Appropriations, and especially upon myself and the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it is very evident, I think, that we can not get a quorum this afternoon.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; we can.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. CLAPP and Mr. RANSDELL. Let us try.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina if we could have a yea-and-nay vote, that would take the place of calling for a quorum.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought that perhaps we might have unanimous consent to vote not later than 12 o'clock to-morrow on this particular item.

Mr. KENYON. I am perfectly willing to do that, but I think we can vote now.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let us vote now.

Mr. WATSON. Why not vote now?

Mr. OVERMAN. All right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senate simply a few words. The estimate made for the appropriations for the next fiscal year in the departments was $42,000,000. The Senate have reduced the appropriations not in one bureau or in one department, but in every department and every bureau. We have given them less than they estimated for. So the bill carries $39,000,000. That is not counting the salaries. We have been cutting in every department and every bureau of the Government, thinking that they ought to get along with the same amount that they got along with last year; that is, in every bureau except one—the Census, probably. We had to increase that because the law requires them to take the marriage and divorce census next year, and we had to make that appropriation. If it had not been required by law, we would not have given that. I do not believe we have increased a single salary in the service of the Government. We did create one office, an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, which we think the Secretary of the Treasury ought to have, but it was ruled out on a point of order.

The Librarian of Congress asked for a very large increase, and we gave them one increase of $900.

The Department of State asked for a very large sum, and we gave them an increase of only $3,600. To the Treasury Department we gave an increase of only $8,000, and we cut them down tens of thousands of dollars; and so on with every bureau in every department of the Government.

We cut down this appropriation because the Children's Bureau are doing this work now. In the last year they have been collecting infant mortality statistics. They are doing it now, and we expect them to get along with the very same sum that they are getting this year. It is no time to grant an increase, especially when they did not ask us for a single dollar. They do not ask us for a single dollar to take this census of infant mortality. That was done on the floor of the House. The Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives did not give them this appropriation. Why? Because they said they had enough money to go on with. The Member of the House who introduced the amendment used this language; and it is not the language of Secretary Wilson and it is not the language of Miss Lathrop or anybody else's language.

As the Senator from Florida explained, what did they ask for? They have 73 clerks and they asked for 57 more clerks. Why did they ask for them? They did not ask for any money to continue this work, yet all this speech has been made here for three hours this evening to the effect that they want to go on with taking the census of infant mortality in this country. They do not put it upon that ground at all. Therefore, we did not think it was the time, with the condition of the Treasury of the United States staring us in the face, to deal with this bureau otherwise than we deal with every other department in the Government. We have dealt in the same way with every other department in the Government, and we have refused increases to the amount of $2,600,000 in all the departments. That was the reason of our action, and not to cripple anybody. They ought to get along with the same amount of money they got along with the current year, and that is what we gave them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate for more than a moment. What little I shall say will be in justification of the vote that I shall cast upon this item.

No one believes more than I in the preservation of child life, and I would not measure it in dollars and cents. I would not hesitate even under the present condition of the Treasury to appropriate money if it were necessary and for that purpose.

But, Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations heard not only the head of this bureau testify as to what was wanted, but it also studied the testimony which was given before the Appropriation Committee of the House. Not only that, but it took into consideration the estimates that were submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, as required by law, before taking the action that it did.

Mr. President, I have the wording as contained in those estimates. The estimates state just what the bureau wanted and what the money was to be appropriated for. The language that was adopted on the floor of the House is not the language suggested by any member of the bureau, nor is it in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. What the appropriation was wanted for is contained in the estimate and discussed in the House hearings at page 506:

CHILDREN'S BUREAU.

[House hearings, p. 506.]

Estimated new and omitted:

1	expert on research	$2,000
5	special agents, at $1,400 each	7,000
8	special agents, at $1,200 each	9,600
1	administrative clerk	2,000
3	clerks of class 4, at $1,800 each	5,400
4	clerks of class 3, at $1,600 each	6,400
6	clerks of class 2, at $1,400 each	8,400
7	clerks of class 1, at $1,200 each	8,400
17	clerks, at $1,000 each	17,000
4	copyists, at $900 each	3,600
1	assistant messenger	720
57	Total	70,520

That is what the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury contained. That is what was asked from the House Appropriations Committee and refused by that committee. That is what was presented to your committee and asked by the head of the bureau.

I want the Senate also to understand that there was another item which was presented not only to the House but to the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations. The request is found in the House hearings on page 507, and is the only request made for an appropriation for the child-welfare survey, that we have heard so much about. The request that was made and considered by the House Committee on Appropriations and refused is as follows:

CHILDREN'S BUREAU—CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

[House hearings, p. 507.]

* * * expenses of attendance of officers and employees at meetings or conventions of members of societies and associations when authorized by the Secretary of Labor; employment of a supervisor of child-welfare surveys, to be paid at a rate not exceeding $3,500 per annum; experts for child-welfare surveys, to be paid at a rate not exceeding $2,500 per annum; assistants for child-welfare surveys, to be paid at a rate not exceeding $1,200 per annum; experts and temporary assistants, to be paid at a rate not exceeding $8 a day; interpreters, to be paid at a rate not exceeding $4 a day when actually employed; rental and equipment of rooms for temporary field quarters, including care of same, furniture, and telephone service; temporary clerks and stenographers in the District of Columbia, to be selected from the civil-service registers and to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $100 per month, the same person to be employed for not more than 6 consecutive months, the total expenditure for such temporary clerical assistance in the District of Columbia not to exceed $5,000 * * *.

* * * and for the purchase of materials for exhibits and conferences, and the rental and equipment of a demonstration car * * *.

That was asked for under the head of contingent expenses. The hearings were held before the Appropriations Committee of the House and the request was denied. No one offered the amendment upon the floor of the House. This is the provision, if you desire to appropriate for child welfare, that ought to have been included in the bill, and not the amendment adopted in the House. That is one reason why the Committee on Appropriations acted as they did. The committee allowed the amounts that were appropriated for last session, as stated by the Senator from North Carolina, and it cut out the amendment that was adopted in the House, because that provided for clerks, amounting to 57 in all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In case the House provision is retained by the Senate, can any portion of the money so appropriated be used for child-welfare work, of which we have heard so much?

Mr. SMOOT. I could not say exactly whether it could or not, although I think under the language it could be used for child welfare. I do not know how far that would go. Nor do I understand to what extent it could be used for that purpose. I will say to the Senator that I very much prefer, if we are going to have any change at all, the language as it was provided in the estimates.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The reason why I rose was that I had not heard the point made which the Senator has just made. My sympathy with this increased appropriation exists because of the fact that it could be used for the purposes which have been mentioned; but if it can not be so used, and the department has not asked for any extra appropriation for the other work, it seems to me that the committee is absolutely right. If, however, it is necessary to change this amendment so that it can be applied to the particular object which Senators have in mind, I think it should be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator. I will say that the department have asked for these 57 extra clerks; they designate the classes of clerks they desire and state just exactly what salaries they are to receive. That was disagreed to by the committee of the other House, and the proposition was never offered as an amendment upon the floor of the House. The question of the increased number of clerks was not considered, nor did the committee of the Senate consider it, because of the fact it had disregarded any claim for increase in the number of clerks or any increase of the salary of clerks in all of the departments of the Government.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator.

I wish further to say to the Senator from Michigan that I know there have been clerks asked for in the other departments that should have been allowed; but, as I have said, the policy decided upon by the majority members of the committee was not to allow any additional clerks nor to allow any increases of salaries. That is the reason the committee did not allow any of the 57 clerks to this bureau. In addition to that, the committee in the House of Representatives, after discussing the question and after holding hearings upon it, refused to grant the increase of clerks.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me finish what I was about to say. Then, do I understand that the increased appropriation made by the House of Representatives was for the purpose of covering the expenditure which would be required by the allowance of these 57 additional clerks?

Mr. SMOOT. All I can say is, that it will be used for that purpose if the original request made by the department is agreed to. Under the wording of the amendment, I can not say what they will use the money for; but I will say to the Senator that it is the same amount asked for with which to pay these 57 additional clerks.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator say there was a discussion of this question in the other House as to the increase of the number of clerks, and that it was defeated?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Iowa misunderstood me. I said there was a discussion in the committee, not in the House.

Mr. KENYON. A point of order would lie in the House against the increased number of clerks.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. KENYON. Hence the wording that appears in this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Iowa is correct; but he misunderstood me if he thought that I said the matter was discussed on the floor of the House. I said that it was discussed in the committee of the House.

Mr. CLARK. Is this the exact amount which was asked for by the bureau?

Mr. SMOOT. It is, within just a few dollars.

Mr. President, I have been in sympathy with the work of this bureau. I have seen some of the effects from its labors, but I have not been in sympathy with the overlapping and duplication of this work. For four or five years we have called attention to this very matter upon the floor of the Senate, but somehow or other there is no diminution whatever in the appropriations for the Public Health Service for its work, and now the educational department is issuing bulletins upon the same subject.

As I said the other day, that there is a duplication of work there can be no question. If there were some way of amending this bill so as to prevent any other department of the Government from doing the same work—for I recognize its importance and know that the work ought to be done—I believe that such an amendment ought to be made, for I do not know how we are going to stop a duplication unless some definite action to that end is taken by the Senate of the United States.

When the sundry civil bill comes into the Senate I will undertake to state now that there will be an appropriation contained in it for the Public Health Service that will be expended for this exact work, and I think the Appropriations Committee ought to take it up and see that there is an end to duplication of all activities of the Government. I am perfectly willing that this bureau should do the work; it is not that on which my objection is based, for, as I said before, the work ought to be done; but, Mr. President, it does seem to me that we ought to call a halt somewhere to the duplication of work that is going on.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the question with me is this: If this appropriation is passed, will this particular bureau do this work, and would the money be used for this purpose?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It could not be used for any other purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. All I can say is that I do not know whether this appropriation will be used by the bureau for the employment of 57 clerks or not. That, however, is what they ask for; but I will not take the responsibility of saying for what it will be used. I want to be perfectly frank about the matter.

Mr. KENYON. But the Senator will not say that it will not be used for that purpose, will he?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I will not.

Mr. KENYON. And the chief of the bureau has stated that it will be used for this work, and that ought to be enough.

Mr. SMOOT. I said I would not say that it would not be used for that purpose. All I say is that, so far as the Appropriations Committee is concerned, the only thing it had to take into consideration was the employment of 57 extra clerks asked for, and this was denied by the committee. This amendment was adopted on the floor of the House, and we thought—and I believe we were justified in so thinking as a committee—that this appropriation simply covered the payment of the 57 extra clerks asked for.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator know whether it was claimed that in order to do this work it was necessary to increase the clerical force? What was the reason given for desiring to increase the clerical force?

Mr. SMOOT. Among other things mentioned, this particular work was pointed out as being necessary.

Mr. WORKS. The result will be that most of the money will go for the payment of extra clerks.

Mr. SMOOT. If the money is used for the purpose that they stated they wanted it used for and the purpose the estimates call for, there will be no question but that it will be used for the payment of the 57 extra clerks. I do not know what the 57 clerks are going to be assigned to do. It is stated exactly of what classes the clerks shall be, but what they are going to do is not stated. I will say, however, that there are no salaries for doctors asked for. I have also heard it stated—although I am not positive whether it is true or not, for I have not investigated it—that the Children's Bureau has assigned to it, upon the request of the head of the bureau, certain physicians from the Public Health Service to do a great deal of this special work.

Mr. WORKS. I want to ask whether it was stated that the persons named to do the work are experts, or if they are simply ordinary clerks?

Mr. SMOOT. The estimates covered:

One expert on research, $2,000; 5 special agents, at $1,400 each; 8 special agents, at $1,200 each; 1 administrative clerk, $2,000; 3 clerks of class 4, at $1,800 each; 4 clerks of class 3, at $1,600 each; 6 clerks of class 2, at $1,400 each; 7 clerks of class 1, at $1,200 each; 17 clerks, at $1,000 each; 4 copyists, at $900 each; 1 assistant messenger, $720.

Mr. WORKS. If I knew what a "special agent" meant, I would be informed.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I can not inform the Senator, for I do not know what they would be called upon to do.

Now, Mr. President, I wanted to say this much in justification of the position that was taken by the Appropriations Committee of the Senate. I believe that the other members feel as I do, although I have never heard them express themselves as I have done this afternoon. No Senator and no other person is more interested in child life, their care and protection, than am I. I do not want to withhold from this bureau a single cent that is necessary; but it seems to me, Mr. President, from the hearings that were had, that these 57 employees asked for would not assist in extending that particular work. It may be so, although there is nothing in the testimony, so far as I have seen, that would justify that conclusion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. Observing that he is absent and not being able to make a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "nay."

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. In his absence I refrain from voting. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were privileged to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], but as I understand he would vote as I am about to vote, I feel at liberty to vote, and therefore vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LANE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent on official business.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT. I inquire whether the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. LIPPITT. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT. I should like to inquire whether the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. DU PONT. As I have a general pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bankhead	Overman	Smoot	Williams
Bryan	Ransdell	Stone	Works
Fletcher	Robinson	Thomas
Gallinger	Smith, Ga.	Tillman
Hitchcock	Smith, S. C.	Warren

NAYS—31.

Ashurst	James	Myers	Sterling
Borah	Jones	Norris	Thompson
Brandegee	Kenyon	Page	Townsend
Clark	La Follette	Phelan	Vardaman
Cummins	Lane	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Curtis	Lippitt	Pomerene	Watson
Hollis	McLean	Sheppard	Weeks
Husting	Martine, N. J.	Sherman

NOT VOTING—48.

Beckham	Culberson	Harding	Lee, Md.
Brady	Dillingham	Hardwick	Lewis
Broussard	du Pont	Hughes	Lodge
Catron	Fall	Johnson, Me.	McCumber
Chamberlain	Fernald	Johnson, S. Dak.	Martin, Va.

Oliver	Reed	Simmons	Sutherland
Owen	Saulsbury	Smith, Ariz.	Swanson
Penrose	Shafroth	Smith, Md.	Underwood
Pittman	Shields	Smith, Mich.	Walsh

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the question of agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee the yeas are 17 and the nays are 31. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] are in the Chamber and paired. The amendment is rejected.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 143, line 9, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$8" and insert "$6."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senate has passed on this matter, and it can do as it pleases about this item. We struck out $8 a day and made it $6. That is about all it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the next amendment is really a part of what we have been considering for two or three days, and there was a sort of understanding that it should follow the previous vote. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if that is not correct?

Mr. OVERMAN. I stated that if the Senate should strike out these four lines at the top of page 143 I should make no contest whatever about these related matters; the Senate could do as it pleased.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 143, line 21, where it is proposed to strike out "$95,000" and to insert "$58,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 151, where the committee amendment proposes to strike out lines 5 to 20, inclusive, being section 7, in the following words:

SEC. 7. That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate per annum less than $1,200, and for increased compensation at the rate of 5 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum, so much as may be necessary is appropriated: Provided, That this section shall only apply to the employees who are appropriated for in this act specifically and under lump sums or whose employment is authorized herein: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator having the bill in charge that that amendment will lead to a great deal of debate. It seems to me there is no necessity of starting with the consideration of it to-night.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not adjourn now?

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to get unanimous consent first that we shall meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 685).

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent to submit a short order for immediate consideration.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That the address of the President of the United States delivered to the Senate to-day be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that 25,000 copies thereof be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the adoption of the order?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to object at all to the printing of the address, but it seems to me that under the law an order involving expense must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I should like to ask the Chair if this order falls within that category? Of course, if it does it will have to go to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no idea as to how the expense of printing is paid.

Mr. FLETCHER. Allow me to suggest that under the order of the Senate the address may be printed as a public document without any reference.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not alone what this is, I will say to the Senator. If it was simply to print the address as a public document there would be no question about it. The order does not provide that it shall be printed as a public document, but that the address shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and that 25,000 copies of it shall be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. As a public document.

Mr. STONE. As a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. The only question in my mind is whether, being an order and carrying an expenditure, it ought not to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that the Senator from Missouri simply means to have the address printed as a public document and that 25,000 copies be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, if that is his request, then I do not object at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. The estimate of the cost is about $116.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not object to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is within the Senate limit.

Mr. STONE. That is what I do request. That the address be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the order? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, since neither of the Senators from Nebraska is here, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 23, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 22, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art ever present; an immanent God; working in and through the material and spiritual realms; creating, recreating; transmitting, transforming; moving ever onward to larger life and nobler achievements; make us susceptible to Thy holy influence, that with pure conceptions and high ideals we may be the instruments in Thy hands for the furtherance of Thy plans and purposes; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 20, 1917, was read and approved.

ELECTION CONTESTS—BROWN V. HICKS.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Elections No. 3 to present a unanimous report (No. 1326) in the contested-election case of Brown against Hicks, and to move the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the resolutions (H. Res. 462), as follows:

Resolved, That Lathrop Brown was not elected Representative to the Sixty-fourth Congress from the first congressional district of New York.

Resolved, That Frederick C. Hicks was elected a Representative to the Sixty-fourth Congress from the first congressional district of New York, and he is entitled to retain his seat therein.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, as I said, this is a unanimous report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

CANTOR V. SIEGEL.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I am also directed by the Committee on Elections No. 3 to present a unanimous report (No. 1325) of the committee in the case of Cantor against Siegel, and I move the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the resolutions (H. Res. 461), as follows:

Resolved, That Jacob A. Cantor was not elected a Representative to the Sixty-fourth Congress from the twentieth congressional district of New York.

Resolved, That Isaac Siegel was elected a Representative to the Sixty-fourth Congress from the twentieth congressional district of New York, and is entitled to retain his seat therein.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

MILITARY PREPARATION.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one moment upon the subject of citizens' aid to military preparation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a number of gentlemen of the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois, whose names stand for a great deal in the business and industrial life of that city and State, many of whom have been connected either with the Army or the National Guard, have with a great deal of thought and labor evolved a most excellent system whereby the citizen may be of very great aid in the preparation for military defense, should such defense ever be required on the part of this country. As a result of many weeks and months of study, they have reduced to a comprehensive scheme this plan. I feel that this scheme is well worthy of preservation and wider circulation, and with the consent of the House I shall insert it as a part of my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. The matter referred to is as follows:

NAMES OF SPONSORS OF THE MOVEMENT OUTLINED.

Gordon Strong, Arthur Heurtley, Ralph C. Otis, Tracy Alden, Robert H. McCormick, jr., Emil C. Wetten, Henry Russell Platt, Benjamin Carpenter, William B. Mann, Buckingham Chandler, Henry W. Austin, E. Allen Frost, C. L. Daniels, Edmund A. Russell, Andrew R. Sheriff, John J. Arnold, Harve G. Badgerow, Maclay Hoyne, Philetus W. Gates, Arnold Joerns, Matthew Mills, William G. LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL OF THE MEMORANDUM.

BUSINESS MEN'S COMMITTEE FOR A NEW NATIONAL GUARD REGIMENT, CHICAGO.

DEAR SIR: A few of us, the signers of this letter, have recently come together as a sort of informal committee to promote the organization of a regiment by business men along the general lines indicated in the memorandum inclosed herewith.

We believe that you are in sympathy with the general policy of military "preparedness," and we assume that you feel a desire to be of some real and personal service in this cause, just as we ourselves desire. We suppose that you may have some doubt as to the form in which you can, as a practical matter, give such real and personal service, just as we ourselves have been doubtful.

We suggest, therefore, that you look over the inclosed memorandum, which is offered as a solution of the problem, a practical scheme offering a place for each man who feels as you and we do. Your exact place in the scheme may perhaps require thought, and will have to be determined later in connection with the others who take part in it. But that some place in such a general scheme would fit you we think you will be disposed to agree.

The scheme probably is applicable to every existing National Guard organization, but we do not propose to attach it to any such organization, at least as a first step. We propose, on the contrary, to institute the first of the many new National Guard organizations required under the new Army law—to be more specific, a regiment of Infantry to form part of the Illinois National Guard and of the new Federal system.

Details will, of course, have to evolve later. At present we are desirous of finding out who of our good and well-known citizens are disposed to take some part in the new regiment, the exact part to be one of the later details.

With the active support of such men as yourself the plan has no element of doubt. Without such support, it has little element of feasibility; the country would not yet be prepared for "preparedness."

Committee members: Gordon Strong, Arthur Heurtley, Ralph C. Otis, Tracy Alden, Robert H. McCormick, jr., Philetus W. Gates, Andrew R. Sheriff, John J. Arnold, Albert A. Sprague, 2d, Harve G. Badgerow, Robert J. Thorne, and Maclay Hoyne.

Yours, very sincerely,

T. W. WINSTON,
For the Committee.

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A REGIMENT BY BUSINESS MEN.

I. Modern armies, under every form of government, from the democratic to the despotic, consist pricipally of "citizen-soldiers." The present European armies are 80 per cent citizen-soldiers—men who in July, 1914, were engaged in peaceful pursuits and will return to these pursuits with the return of peace.

No nation can support through times of peace a professional army large enough for a time of war.

II. A democracy has a second reason for the organization of its citizens as soldiers—we have expressed in our National Constitution our belief that:

"A well-regulated militia is necessary to the security of a free State."

III. In more modern phraseology, no real American will permit anybody else to do his voting or his fighting for him.

Military service is not to be delegated—it is personal to you and to me.

IV. But if any man is to fight effectively in the future, he must prepare thoroughly now. And telling others to prepare is not preparedness.

Preparedness is preparing yourself and myself.

V. Preparedness can not be left to Congress and to legislation. There has always been enough legislation to permit and to help you and me to prepare, if we had wanted to. Recently Congress has passed enough legislation to make the United States a formidable military power, if you and I take advantage of it. But if you and I continue to leave it to the other fellow, we will continue to find that there are not enough fellows to perform our service for us.

Congress has done its bit; how about you and me?

VI. Preparedness is not limited to learning how; it is not satisfied with a month at a training camp in the duties of a private and in the expectation of a commission as an officer. It would take the Government a month or two to find you a place as an officer, and it would take you three to six months to train the privates assigned to you, if you found you had the executive capacity to do it.

Preparedness on your part and my part means that, if called out this morning, we leave with our regiment this afternoon.

VII. There is a world of meaning in the brief phrase above—"our regiment." A "regiment" means an organization complete at the moment in all the parts that modern military science prescribes for war purposes. It means a factory built, equipped, its machines oiled ready for the wheels to turn. It means, indeed, that the wheels have turned, and turned repeatedly, and are ready instantly to turn again. And "our" regiment means that you and I have definite places in it, to which we step at once and without uncertainty, still more, without confusion. It means that we know it from top to bottom, just as the regiment knows us. It means that we think it is the finest regiment in captivity and all we want is a chance to break loose and to demonstrate our belief.

VIII. The preparedness that stops at a training camp may, by similar analogy, be compared with the instruction of citizens here and there as foremen in factory work. If called upon to act, and if they finally decide they will act, they will still be helpless until some one has organized them, and again helpless until they have organized and instructed the operatives under them—to say nothing of the helplessness of all concerned until supplied with the necessary machinery. If the training camp satisfies the popular demand for preparedness it is the most unfortunate of military makeshifts to date.

IX. On the other hand, if the time has come in which those American men who have distinguished themselves in business recognize the real significance of, and experience a real desire for, military preparedness—complete preparedness, organized preparedness—then such organizations of American citizen-soldiers will set new standards in military efficiency as certainly as the same men have set standards of commercial enterprise and success.

For the event that this time has come, the following suggestions are offered as to the—

(a) Needs of a citizen-soldiers organization.

(b) Methods of supplying such needs by business men.

X. The first necessity of the citizen-soldier, whether officer or private, is his necessity of earning a living. The very fact that he is a citizen-soldier and not a professional soldier spells this necessity. The citizen-soldier can give to his military duties only what time is left over from his civilian duties. His military duties should therefore be limited strictly to those increasing his military proficiency. He should, in his capacity as a citizen-soldier, have no duties whatsoever of a quasi military or nonmilitary nature which can be performed by any one else equally well or better. The professional soldier may perhaps be given some quasi military or nonmilitary duties without detriment to his military proficiency—he has all day and every day to give to the job. An hour of such work given to a citizen-soldier detracts one hour from his soldierly development.

XI. On the other hand, there are many and absolutely necessary quasi military or altogether nonmilitary duties which have to be performed in connection with a citizen-soldier organization by some one. Some one must rent and equip a building as an armory to start with. Some one must subsequently conduct a campaign for a legislative appropriation to build one. Someone must oversee the numberless details in the preparation of plans and the construction of such a building.

Some one must attend to the administration of the armory—its lighting, heating, janitor service, repair, and many other such items. Some one must, on spare nights, rent the armory out for the sake of the rental thereby acquired for the regimental fund.

Some one must obtain financial contributions over and above the legislative appropriation and the rentals in question. Congress appropriates nothing and the State legislature will never appropriate enough for the maintenance of either a company or a regiment with adequate facilities for developing their military proficiency. This deficit can only be made up by the contributions of individuals. Some one must solicit these contributions.

Some one must obtain recruits for each company so long as the voluntary system continues and unless and until we adopt the universal compulsion of the Old World; some one must persuade citizen soldiers that it is a part of good citizenship to do their part of soldiering; some one must advertise that this is the time and the place and the regiment; some one must keep the ranks filled or there is no regiment.

Some one in the past has had to organize social features by company, battalion, and regiment; athletic events, and every other interest and inducement to obtain desirable recruits.

It is barely possible that in the future the pay provisions of the new Army law will so assist recruiting that these additional inducements will not be strictly necessary. On the other hand, to get the best possible class of recruits it will probably continue desirable to offer the greatest practicable inducements.

Some one must, even after recruits are once enlisted, see to it that they attend drill on the one hand and that they do not lose their jobs on the other hand. The penalties for desertion will not provide drill attendance, or, if exercised for this purpose, they will put an end to recruiting. The citizen soldier can not practically be compelled to attend drill. He must be helped and persuaded to attend drill. That this can be done under a voluntary system the records of many organizations give convincing testimony.

XII. All of the above functions, which are necessary functions for the maintenance of a citizen-soldier organization, are more or less nonmilitary. Most of them are absolutely nonmilitary and have no more connection with real soldiering than the raising of cattle for Army consumption or the weaving of cloth for military uniforms. The best proof of the nonmilitary character of these functions is that the professional soldier is not called upon to perform any of them while in the exercise of his real military duties. He may be given a job at some post as quartermaster or in some city as recruiting officer; but the field service knows no such functions. Even in peace service at posts, line officers are no more concerned in their housing, financing, or their recruiting than they are with agriculture or textile manufacture.

In the United States in the past, however, citizen-soldier organizations have had these functions to perform as a necessity to their existence. These functions have, therefore, been given the first thought and time of the officers of such organizations, primarily of the captains in one-company stations in small towns and of the colonels in regimental stations in cities. It has been the obvious and unavoidable result that officers could not develop on their own part or that of their organizations the degree of military proficiency which they have desired or which they could have developed if their time and efforts had been devoted exclusively to military study and work.

XIII. To solve this very fundamental problem the solution is proposed that with each regiment and its three "combatant" battalions there be established a "home battalion," the function of the home battalion to be the performance of all of the nonmilitary or quasi-military duties that can be by it performed, leaving to the combatant battalions and their officers nothing but the technical instruction and practice of themselves and their men as soldiers.

A tentative detailed scheme of organization of such a "home battalion" is outlined in Appendix A. Only the general principles underlying the scheme are here suggested.

XIV. The functions to be performed have been indicated in paragraph 11 above. The method of performing them and its applicability to you as a business man remain to be considered.

Let us assume that you are a young married man with a family, fighting your way in the business world, and with serious results threatening you and yours if you let up in your fight. You should not be called upon to fight in the military world except as a very last resource. You should not be solicited to enlist—you should not even be permitted to enlist—in a citizen-soldier organization. You do not belong in the first line or in the second line or perhaps even in the third line.

But patriotism and preparedness may have come home to you, and you may want to serve your country and serve it now. You can do it by joining the home battalion and by giving the same amount of time to the work of the regiment in its administrative activities that your fellow citizens without such home ties are giving in the combatant battalions to learning to fight. The work is there, and it is just as necessary upon some one's part as learning to fight; all that remains is for you to be that some one.

The duties are not nominal and honoray; they involve constant responsibility, real and practical work. If they are performed successfully, the regiment will profit as much, and you can congratulate yourself as much as if you had taken part in a successful maneuver in the field. And with the proper and close affiliation between the combatant and the home battalions these facts will be duly recognized.

XV. Perhaps in your business career you have passed beyond the stage outlined above. You have a wife and family, but they are no longer strictly dependent upon you, because your business success has made them independent. But your business itself may be in a large measure dependent upon you. It may be dependent upon you to such an extent that any considerable time taken from it means a loss to the interests you represent which you have no right to inflict.

Yet, as in the case of our younger friend above, patriotism and preparedness may have come home to you also, and you, too, may want to serve your country and serve it now. You can do it by joining the home battalion and by giving a sum of money according to your desire and your capacity, coupled with your moral support, to be expressed by quarterly or other periodic attendance at regimental formations in the armory and in the field, and by personal acquaintance with and encouragement of your fellow members of the home battalion and the members of the combatant battalions.

The foregoing form of service is to be distinguished from the writing of a check to satisfy an importunate solicitor and forgetting about it for the 12 months ensuing. Unless your good will, expressed by your attendance as above, goes with your check the contribution should be returned and the membership in the home battalion canceled.

The service of the flag is personal service; it is not almsgiving, and it is not the hiring of a mercenary force.

As to the amount of money that you turn into the regimental fund along with your good will you may find it helpful to use the new Army law to determine. The law estimates the value per annum of the time given by a private at $50. There is no lower grade in which a man may serve than as a private. If your ambition mounts to higher flights, you may give the equivalent of the services of a captain, which the Army law fixes at $500. Lest the regiment be considered the creature of "predatory wealth," this is perhaps the largest single contribution that should be received. There are intervening ranks and values, some one of which may meet your estimate of your duty in the premises.

All of the sums so contributed should go into the regimental fund and be administered and dispensed by the officers of the home battalion for the sole purpose of maintaining and increasing the efficiency of the combatant battalions and the regiment as a fighting machine.

XVI. It seems reasonable that a regiment built upon the lines of strict military proficiency and devotion to military work on the part of its combatant battalions and upon the basis of active support with the best thought and time and money of its home battalion can and will develop a new standard in citizen soldiery and solve the problem of preparedness without militarism of democracy with adequate defense.

The success of this solution depends on you and on me. I am ready to begin now. How about you?

TYPEWRITTEN APPENDIX TO MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A REGIMENT BY BUSINESS MEN.

HOME BATTALION.

President, first vice president (ex officio chairman of house committee), second vice president (ex officio chairman of recruiting committee), third vice president (ex officio chairman of finance committee), fourth vice president (ex officio chairman of political-action committee), fifth vice president (ex officio chairman of athletic committee), sixth vice president (ex officio chairman of entertainment committee), secretary, assistant secretary, treasurer, legal counsel, publicity manager, librarian, and band director.

Executive committee: House committee, recruiting committee, political-action committee, athletic committee, entertainment.

Company A: Captain, first lieutenant, second lieutenant, sergeants, corporals, privates.

Company B: Captain, first lieutenant, second lieutenant, sergeants, corporals, privates.

Company C: Captain, first lieutenant, second lieutenant, sergeants, corporals, privates.

Company D: Captain, first lieutenant, second lieutenant, sergeants, corporals, privates.

OFFICERS AND COMMITTEE MEN.

The duty of officers and committee men, in general, would be the devotion of the necessary time to the performance of the functions referred to in Paragraph XI and according to the method outlined in Paragraphs XIV and XV of the foregoing memorandum. In general the scheme of organization and the apportionment of work should be such that the time required of each officer and committee man of the home battalion will be approximately that required of any officer or private of the combatant battalions. This last amounts to at least one evening per week and two weeks per annum. All officers of the home battalion should probably report at the armory for conference and business one evening per week. Committee meetings can be arranged either on such evening or in the daytime, as most convenient. Much of the individual work of officers and of committee men will probably be most conveniently done through their respective business offices and during business hours.

It is not intended that the positions of officers and committee men of the home battalion should be nominal but practical working positions. Only those prepared to give the necessary time and work should consider taking such.

On the other hand, there will be unquestionably a great deal of detail work which could, as a business proposition, be most cheaply and effectively handled by some one personally giving the greater part or all of his time to such work, and he should therefore be compensated from the regimental fund. This person may perhaps be designated as an "assistant secretary," and such position is included in the scheme of organization proposed. All other officers and committee men of the home battalion should give the fractional time required of them without compensation as their contribution to the regiment and to national defense.

PRESIDENT.

The duties of the president would be those of the president of any other organization for cooperative public service. On the other hand, it should not be permitted, as in case of many organizations for public service, that the president perform the duties of most other officers and committee men, through default on their part. The home-battalion scheme rests on personal service, which can not be rendered and evaded at the same time.

VICE PRESIDENTS.

It is suggested, as a possible feature of organization, that the number of vice presidents correspond with the number of standing committees, one vice president to be ex officio the chairman of each committee, all such vice presidents to be also ex officio members of the executive committee and to represent in the weekly meetings of the executive committee the work of their respective standing committee.

SECRETARY.

The duties of the Secretary would be those ordinarily pertaining to the position and title, and should include the custody of all of the records of the home battalion at the armory, these records comprising everything connected with the civil administration of the regiment, and with the work of the various committees, etc. The secretary could probably perform but supervision only in the limited time available by him, and the very considerable detail work should be performed by an assistant secretary, as sugested above and in the following:

ASSISTANT SECRETARY.

The duties of the assistant secretary would, in general, be those suggested above, in connection with the secretary, and would unquestionably be numerous and time consuming enough, if properly handled, to demand most, if not all, of the time of a capable man, which time should therefore be compensated from the regimental fund, as suggested above in connection with officers and committee men in general.

TREASURER.

The duties of the treasurer would be those ordinarily pertaining to the position and title. These duties should also include the handling of all State and Federal allotments from appropriations for the regiment either for armory rent or other purposes, their correct vouchering, and the like. Although this is a quasi-military matter, it is one that can perfectly well be performed by a capable civilian, and one of which the combatant officers should be relieved. The treasurer can and should be assisted in the details of his work by the assistant secretary.

LEGAL COUNSEL.

There should be at least one, and perhaps for cases of absence from town two, competent attorneys to attend not only to such matters as are of a purely civil nature, such as the execution of contracts and the like, but also to relieve the combatant officers of quasimilitary functions, such as the determination of questions of military law, prosecution when thought advisable of military offenses, advice and assistance in matters of court-martial, boards of survey, and the like It would not be feasible for combatant officers to take all such matters up either with the judge advocate general of the State or with a judge advocate of the United States.

PUBLICITY MANAGER.

There should be at least one and probably two or three competent advertising and newspaper men whose duty it will be to see that the regiment has its proper place in public opinion. No one will join either the combatant battalions or the home battalion without knowing about the regiment and without believing that it is the best regiment to join. The publicity should suggest ways and means for developing the necessary publicity, giving so much of their time toward effecting the ways and means as is necessary, but in many cases acting through the officers and through the several committees.

LIBRARIAN.

The regiment should have an absolutely first-class regimental military library in a proper sort of reading room, offering every facility for military study to officers and privates of the combatant battalions. The duties of the librarian should be to see that such is the case. In the details of such duty, particularly in the cataloguing, the issue and receipts of books, etc., he should be represented by the assistant secretary.

BAND DIRECTOR.

Every regiment is required by law to have a band. A model regiment should have a model band, and it should be the duty of the band director to see that it has such; moreover, the band should not make its first and last appearance at the annual encampments. It ought to be on hand for at least monthly formations of the regiments and band concerts, perhaps with dancing afterwards. Band music is one of the best emotional stimulants to patriotic and military ardor. This fact is perfectly well known to present organizations, and the only reason that they do not have such service on the part of their respective bands is because the regimental funds do not permit. In the case of the regiment proposed, the fund should be large enough to permit of all the band service that is desirable.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

The executive committee should comprise practically all of the officers above enumerated, and should be charged with the general civil administration of the regiment already outlined. It should probably meet weekly at the armory, such meeting to be on the meeting night of the officers of the combatant battalions. This simultaneous meeting of the combatant and of the noncombatant officers will promote the necessary close affiliation between the two groups.

HOUSE COMMITTEE.

This committee should comprise at least one prominent architect, one contractor, and one merchant. The committee should be charged with the equipment, current maintenance, and repair of the armory in every particular.

RECRUITING COMMITTEE.

This committee should comprise several employers in different lines of employment who are in wide touch with the conditions of civil employment. The duty of this committee would be to devise the necessary recruiting campaigns to fill and to keep filled the ranks of the combatant battalions. They should also consider and pass upon questions arising between soldiers and their employers, matters of drill attendance, and the like.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.

This committee should probably comprise one or more bankers and certainly one or more members versed in public-service organization work. The duty of this committee would be to fill the ranks of the proposed four companies of the home battalion, such companies in turn to consist of the subscribers to the regimental fund.

POLITICAL-ACTION COMMITTEE.

This committee should comprise men of political acquaintance and influence. The duty of this committee would be to see that the regiment has all of the legislative consideration properly due it. In cooperation with similar representatives of other similar organizations they can make the proper showing before State and Federal legislative committees as to the needs of our citizen soldiery as a whole. Appropriations being once made, however, it is to be remembered that their distribution will take place purely through military channels which it should not be attempted in any way to influence or divert.

ATHLETIC COMMITTEE.

The duty of this committee would be to develop athletics, both individual and between organizations, in the regiment, and between the regiment and other regimental organizations, for the double purpose of improving the physique of the soldier and of increasing his interest in the regiment.

ENTERTAINMENT COMMITTEE.

The duty of this committee would be to devise periodic entertainments, particularly for the men of the combatant battalions, such entertainments to constitute an additional inducement over and above that of military service and of Federal pay, to join and to remain in the regiment. Perhaps, without such extra inducement, the ranks could be filled. But with all possible inducements the ranks could be filled with the best possible recruits.

THE COMPANIES.

The home battalion would comprise, in addition to the foregoing officers and committee men, four companies to consist of the subscribers to the regimental fund. The members of these companies would be graded according to the amount of their subscription based upon the pay provisions in the new Army law.

Over and above the making of such contribution, which might be in the form of either annual, semiannual, quarterly, or monthly payments, the duty of each member of each of the four companies would be to attend at least quarterly a regimental formation, one of these formations to be at the annual encampment. By this attendance the members of the four companies will give tangible evidence that their good will goes with their contributions; and they will acquire personal acquaintance not only with the officers and committee men of their own home battalion but also with the officers and, as far as possible, with the men of the combatant battalions.

Finally, each member of each of the four companies will be expected on all occasions to give his good word and his good deed for the benefit of the regiment. So far as he can without the giving of material time and effort, he will be expected to promote the work of the recruiting committee in particular by indorsement, introductions, and the like; and of the other officers and committee men of the home battalion in general.

It will be important and perhaps vital that ways and means be devised for keeping the contributing members of the four companies, who will have no actual and considerable work to do, in close and sympathetic touch with the working personnel of the home battalion and the combatant battalions.

LETTER FOLLOWING THE TRANSMITTAL OF THE MEMORANDUM.

BUSINESS MEN'S COMMITTEE FOR A NEW NATIONAL GUARD REGIMENT, CHICAGO.

DEAR SIR: A short while ago you received from one of us a memorandum concerning the formation of a regiment by business men. Since then a few more of us have joined the colors and undertaken to act as a preliminary organization committee.

The issuing of the memorandum has naturally elicited a variety of replies, disclosing the indeterminate state of mind of the public on this important matter. There appears, we regret to say, some disposition to feel that the subject is important enough to discuss but not to act upon, and even then not to act unless the solution of the question is entirely satisfactory to each individual concerned.

One point of view is that the militaristic chaos in Europe may result in disarmament, arbitration, and other very desirable but apparently uncertain after effects, and that any increase of our military strength at this juncture would be most inopportune.

Another point of view is that we should adopt universal compulsory service, and in the meantime, to be consistent at whatever hazard, we should refrain from voluntary service of any sort. It seems to us, however, that if there is a moderate need for even considering and discussing universal compulsory service, there is very grave and urgent need for some immediate voluntary service until such compulsion comes.

To the advocate of universal service we offer the opinion of Col. Ronayne, a copy of which is transmitted herewith, to the effect that more National Guard regiments are directly in line with any kind of service that is of assured military value.

We further offer the suggestion that every new unit organized, whether voluntary or by compulsion, is another unit; does bring the service that much nearer to being universal; and shows that we believe enough in the service which we preach to put it into personal practice.

Finally, each new unit means a new military school, teaching patriotism and military service as the expression of patriotism, and sending out its students and its graduates to spread this teaching to educate the public.

We very much wish to form a larger committee of organization to work out another step in the direction indicated in the memorandum. One possible form of action and organization is that indicated in the inclosed appendix, but it is entirely tentative as yet.

May we count upon you to be one of us?

LETTER FROM COL. RONAYNE, ILLINOIS NATIONAL GUARD, COMMENTING ON THE PLAN CONTAINED IN THE MEMORANDUM.

CHICAGO, September 25, 1916.

MY DEAR COL. STRONG: In reply to the request of yourself and others for an expression of my opinion as to the relation of a new National Guard regiment, raised under the new Army legislation, to possible universal compulsory service, I have to state as follows:

The opinion that I express must, of course, be understood to be my personal opinion only, and not that of an officer either of the United States Army or of the Illinois National Guard, though, of course, the data upon which my opinion is based have naturally come to me from experience in both of these capacities.

If the United States adopts some form of universal compulsory service, it would do so, more or less, in one of two forms:

(a) A system of training only, by which young men receive instruction supposed to qualify them either as enlisted men or as officers, but without their formation into definite and permanent units. If this system were adopted, it would merely create the impression that the country is prepared, and perhaps would therefore be worse than the present situation, in which the country knows that it is not prepared.

(b) In conjunction with such training as above, the organization of definite and permanent units, whether under Federal or State control, or both, and resembling the National Guard regiments at present. Nothing short of this will ever give a satisfactory service, capable of immediate mobilization, and reliable when mobilized.

There has been of late, as you know, much discussion of the Australian and Swiss systems—usually without real acquaintance with their military value. As to the Australian system, this is clearly the fact, since it has been established so recently that the Australians themselves do not know its military value. So far it is in an undergraduate stage, so to speak, and what its graduates will do when they are ready for service is, of course, an open question. The splendid record made by the Australian troops in the present war has no bearing on the new Australian system; these troops were raised like those in England and like those in our Civil War—by volunteering of untrained men after the war began.

As to the Swiss system, while it has existed much longer, it has not been put to the test of war. And I think it a fair statement to say that a large proportion of military students, including experienced Swiss officers, believe the system to be seriously deficient in many ways.

The War College Division of our General Staff Corps expresses the following opinion as to the merits of the Australian and Swiss systems:

"It must be admitted that the systems of these two States are of doubtful utility to a world power facing the question of adequate preparedness in all its phases."

For the benefit of your business friends, I may suggest that warfare, like those more peaceful activities which we call business, may be looked upon from much the same point of view. A system by which the country receives military training without the organization and the long working out of permanent military units, stands in about the same position as would the vocational education of a lot of young men without organizing them into some factory or store, weeding out the unfit, promoting the fit, and finally establishing a successful business organization.

Business men must surely appreciate this, knowing what is meant by "a going concern." No masses of vocational school or business college graduates, even if organized on paper, or even if attending an annual Chautauqua, would for a moment be considered a real business organization.

Neither would a group of similarly trained individuals constitute a military organization. The nearest approach we have to real military organization, outside of the Regular Army, are those which now form the National Guard. Their efficiency has been variable, and in all cases has been the less for lack of adequate legislative and popular support. While some universal compulsory law might go far to supply this lack of support, it will not, in my judgment, render organization of this type unnecessary. Such organizations must and will continue, perhaps under a range of name, and it is certainly to be hoped with a change of popular appreciation and respect.

To summarize, I suggest that the formation of a new regiment such as proposed by you and your friends would be a step in the direction of universal compulsory service, if such service ever comes; and in the meantime a much-needed substitute.

Yours, very truly,

JAMES RONAYNE.

[Extract from Chicago Commerce (organ of the Chicago Association of Commerce) of Dec. 29, 1915.]

DEFENSE AND BUSINESS MAN—BUILDING NEW NATIONAL GUARD REGIMENTS SUPPORTED BY HOME BATTALIONS.

There is now circulating among well-known business men, and signed by names such as are found below, a communication having for its place of origin the so-called "Business Men's Committee for a New National Guard Regiment." The offices of the committee are in the Republic Building, and the agent of the committee is Lieut. Col. T. W. Winston, United States Army, retired.

The communication in question contains a proposal for the institution of the "first of many new National Guard organizations required under the new Army law; to be more specific, a regiment of Infantry to form part of the Illinois National Guard and of the new Federal system."

Accompanying this communication is a memorandum concerning the establishment of a regiment by business men. This memorandum is direct and pungent stuff designed to promote preparedness through personal service of the citizen-soldier. The memorandum offers suggestions as to the needs of the citizen-soldier organization, and as to the methods of supplying such needs by business men.

This memorandum contains no ineffectual rally-round-the-flag talk, but it aims to impress upon interested men what a regiment would mean which they might be concerned in organizing. It is pointed out that the citizen-soldier's military duties should be limited strictly to those increasing his military proficiency, and as a citizen-soldier he should have no duties which can not be performed by anyone else quite as well or better; on the other hand, there are many necessary quasi-military or wholly nonmilitary duties which have to be performed in connection with a citizen-soldier organization by some one, and this some one, as detailed in this memorandum, has his hands mighty full in various activities.

To account for these activities it is proposed that with each regiment there be established a "home battalion," its function being to perform all nonmilitary or quasi-military duties, leaving to the combatant battalion and their officers nothing but technical instruction and practice of themselves and their men as soldiers.

Many of the men signing the aforesaid circular, and many to whom it has probably been sent, are for various reasons qualified best to join the so-called home battalion, "giving the same amount of time to the work of the regiment in its administrative activities that your fellow citizens without such home ties are giving in the combatant battalions to learning to fight." The duties involve "constant responsibility, real and practical work; the service to the flag is a personal service. It is not almsgiving and it is not hiring of a mercenary force. All sums contributed should go into the regimental fund and should be administered and dispensed by the officers of the home battalion for the sole purpose of maintaining and increasing the efficiency of combatant battalions and the regiment as a fighting machine."

Among the citizens identified with the issuance of the foregoing call to service with the colors in ways both new and old, or pledging subsequent participation, are Albert A. Sprague II, Robert J. Thorne, Robert H. McCormick, jr., Ralph Otis, Arthur Huertley, John J. Arnold, Maclay Hoyne, Arnold Joerns, W. G. Edens, Joseph H. Defrees, Benjamin Carpenter, Henry W. Austin, E. Allen Frost, Philetus W. Gates, Guy Guernsey, Mathew Mills, and others of like standing.

SELECTION OF JURORS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20209) to amend section 276 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 276 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 276. All such jurors, grand and petit, including those summoned during the session of the court, shall be publicly drawn from a box containing, at the time of each drawing, the names of not less than 300 persons, possessing the qualifications prescribed in the section last preceding, which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court, or a duly qualified deputy clerk, and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, or by the judge senior in commission in districts having more than one judge, which commissioner shall be a citizen of good standing, residing in the district in which such court is held, and a well-known member of the principal political party in the district in which the court is held opposing that to which the clerk, or a duly qualified deputy clerk then acting, may belong, the clerk, or a duly qualified deputy clerk, and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately, without reference to party affiliations until the whole number required shall be placed therein."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I read this bill Saturday night and compared it with the existing law, and my recollection is that the only change made from the existing statute is to insert a provision respecting the power of the deputy clerk.

Mr. WEBB. The words are "of a duly qualified deputy clerk." The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. So that instead of the clerk under this decision of the court being required to travel to the various places where court is held, his deputy may aid.

Mr. WEBB. That is very true. There is no money with which to pay a clerk to travel 400 miles to assist in drawing a jury, and along the Mexican border and in other places, unless this provision is made, there will be no court held.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an article by Mr. Charlton G. Ogburn, of the Savannah (Ga.) bar, entitled "The Lawyer and Democracy," appearing in the American Law Review for September-October, 1915.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of salary increase for Federal employees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimouse consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of increasing the salaries of Federal employees. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address by Gen. Black, Chief of Engineers, on some problems connected with inland waterways.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a speech by our former colleague, Capt. Hobson, delivered at Columbus, Ohio, last week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have some information about what this is.

Mr. FESS. The address is entitled "Destroying the destroyer."

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is one of the assaults on the demon rum?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. By schooners or battleships?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my friend from Ohio if this address has not been published in the RECORD already.

Mr. FESS. Not this speech.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask whether the gentleman from Ohio knows the purpose of inserting this in the RECORD? Is it for Capt. Hobson to have it distributed all over the United States at Government expense? When Mr. Hobson was a Member of Congress he sent out millions of copies under his frank, and after he ceased to be a Member of Congress he sent out millions of copies under his frank at the expense of the public. It was the grossest prostitution of the franking privilege that has ever been exhibited in this country. An honest man would not have done it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to another outrage that occurred only a few days ago, where Collier's Weekly advertised that it would send any person, on application, a copy of a speech delivered some time ago; that that was sent under the frank of a Member when, if the speech had to pay postage, it would have cost about 4 cents. It seems to me that if speeches are sent out they ought to be sent by the Member himself.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I paid $103 for printing that speech—every dollar out of my own pocket. They have no franked envelopes, and they must pay the postage.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, I will simply say that a young man sent to Collier's for a copy of the speech and it came back in a big manila envelope with the frank of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. It was without my knowledge.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to frankly state, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that I do not know whether the purpose of Capt. Hobson is to circulate this speech or not. I did not get the speech from Capt. Hobson. I got it and read it yesterday, and I want to state to the House that it is a scholarly speech, and, I think, very worthy of being read. I would not want to take any advantage of the House Members or anyone else. I really think it ought to go into the RECORD.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have three or four minutes to express my views about this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Still reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the gentleman from Texas having his time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Texas addressing the House for four minutes? Of course the gentleman from Ohio will lose none of his rights.

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, within the last few days we have had very elaborate and illuminating discussions about the abuse of the mailing privilege, incidentally the franking privilege. It was very clearly established, convincingly established, to me, at least, that the people, the taxpayers, were contributing many millions of dollars to certain publishers. The products of the printing press belonging to these gentlemen are transported practically free of cost to the ultimate buyer of their publications.

Now, these same papers that enjoy that privilege and have that much advantage—I think I might go so far as to employ the word used by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and say that have so much graft out of the Public Treasury—have been howling against what they call "pork." Why, Mr. Speaker, if the recent public-building bill was all pork, this publishers' benefit is an annual packing house. [Laughter and applause.]

They can not say, or at least they refuse to concede, what is evident to all other people, that they are getting the benefit of a tax levied upon people who are not their customers. I believe that the cost of the transportation of the products of the printing press should be paid by the people who benefit by these publications, and I can see no more reason for transporting magazines at the expense of the General Treasury than I can for the transportation at nominal cost of the wheat and corn and meat that grow in my district to the ultimate consumer, for certainly bread is of more value to more people than magazines. Man can not live by magazines alone.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio said he wanted to answer frankly, but he knows that the purpose of printing this speech of Capt. Hobson is to get it circulated without the payment of postage.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. If it goes into the RECORD under my name, it would have to be circulated under my frank, would it not?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, no; I think not.

Mr. FESS. I was about to say that it would not be circulated under my frank.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may get along with other and more pressing business, in view of the deficit, and in view of the fact that we are already making contributions of several million dollars a year to publishers and can not afford to tax the American people for the benefit of a particular propaganda, I will object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

CHARLESTON HARBOR.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by the president of the Charleston Chamber of Commerce on the development of Charleston Harbor and Navy Yard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. I do not object.

There was no objection.

RIVERS AND HARBORS BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District bills, this being District day.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a preferential motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 20079) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider District bills, and the gentleman from Florida makes a preferential motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the river and harbor bill. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky) there were 62 ayes and 33 noes.

So the motion of Mr. SPARKMAN was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RAINEY as permanent Chairman.

Mr. RUBEY took the chair temporarily in the absence of Mr. RAINEY.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20079) making appropriation for the construction, repair, and the preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUBEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20079, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the rivers and harbors bill, and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to three hours, one half of that time to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I think I will have to have a little more time than that on this side. I have requests for two hours, and I do not see how I can limit it to much less than that, because the longest request that has been made is for 30 minutes, and that is by a member of the committee. I can not see how I can well limit it to less time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four hours, one half of that time to be controlled by myself and the other by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That will be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill shall not exceed four hours, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Florida that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the rivers and harbors bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bill H. R. 20079, the rivers and harbors bill, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20079) making appropriation for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

[Mr. SPARKMAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee for a short time to a matter that has been before Congress for several years, but which has been lying dormant for quite a while. That is the proposal to enact a workmen's compensation law covering the employees of the interstate carriers of the Nation.

President Wilson, in making an address of welcome to the delegates of the social insurance conference held in the city of Washington last month, was quoted as stating that the Nation has turned from political to social questions. To my mind no greater social question has confronted the American people during recent years than the subject of workmen's compensation for our interstate-railway employees.

Since the agitation for legislation in the Sixty-first Congress 32 States have enacted workmen's compensation laws, none of which, so far as I have been able to learn, affects or actually benefits the employees of the interstate railways of our country. The Democratic Party, inspired by the great sentiment which prevailed in the Sixty-second Congress for the enactment of a workmen's compensation law national in its character, inserted in their 1912 platform the following plank:

We pledge the Democratic Party, so far as the Federal jurisdiction extends, to an employees' compensation law providing adequate indemnity for injury to body or loss of life.

Since that time one Democratic Congress has come and gone and another is fast approaching the closing days of its existence. Up to this time no bill has been reported having for its purpose the carrying out of this sacred promise made by the Democracy to labor. Bills were introduced in the Sixty-third Congress and in the first session of this Congress, and the committees to which they were referred have had access to an exhaustive, clear, and comprehensive report on the law and the facts pertaining to the subject of workmen's compensation, consisting of 200 pages, known as Senate Document 338, second session Sixty-second Congress, together with a printed 1,500-page compilation of the hearings upon which this report was based, the result of the labors of a commission created under an act of the Sixty-first Congress, which, by the way, was a Republican Congress, a commission appointed by President Taft, the President of the United States Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman knows, I suspect, that both the Senate and the House passed a Federal workmen's compensation act last September.

Mr. SWITZER. That was a law for the benefit of Government employees only. My remarks are directed to a law national in its character, covering the employees of interstate railways, which measure received the indorsement of your party in 1912, in their national convention, as much as the proposition that you refer to.

The personnel of this commission to which I have just referred consisted of Senators SUTHERLAND and CHAMBERLAIN, Representatives William G. Brantley and Reuben O. Moon, Mr. W. C. Brown, president of the New York Central Railway, a representative of the railways of the country, and Mr. W. L. Cease, editor of the Railway Trainman, a representative of labor.

Since the advent of the Wilson administration Democratic ardor for this particular right of labor seems to have become very much chilled; for while it was a conspicuous plank in the 1912 platform, their more recent expression of platform promises in 1916 is just as conspicuous, because of an entire absence of any specific reference whatever to the subject, amounting to a repudiation of their former stand for the most important social proposition that has faced Congress for several years. And while it may be true, as the President states, that the people are rapidly turning to social questions, it would appear equally apparent that the Democratic Party has not only turned from but has actually run away from an important social problem which four years ago they believed was very much in need of congressional attention, and which they at that time pledged their party to solve speedily by enacting a law providing adequate indemnity for injury to body or loss of life.

The report of the Taft Joint Commission, to which I have just referred, declared that the existing employers' liability based upon negligence and its corresponding defenses no longer meets the requirements of modern industrial conditions, that the system had become outgrown and should be abandoned, and there should be established instead of a system based on the fault of the employer one bottomed upon the fact that injury by accident had occurred while in the course of employment. The commission recommended that every injured employee should receive some compensation, and in the event of the death of the employee by reason of accident that his widow or dependent should receive a reasonable compensation, regardless of the old common-law defenses of assumed risk and contributory negligence; that no act or neglect on the part of the employee or a fellow employee could defeat a recovery unless it be proved that the injury or death was occasioned by his willful intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or another, or that the injury or death was a direct result of his intoxication.

In an effort to carry out the recommendation of the commission the Senate in the Sixty-second Congress, May, 1912, by a vote of 60 to 15, passed a workmen's compensation bill covering the employees of interstate railways. This bill was amended by providing more liberal rates of compensation, and was passed in the House March 1, 1913, by a vote of 218 for to 81 against.

This amended measure went back to the Senate where, under a threat to start a filibuster against it in the closing days of the session, its passage was effectually blocked and it died at the expiration of the Sixty-second Congress.

This measure had the indorsement of all the heads of the various railway brotherhoods; of their representative agent, H. E. Wills; the head of the American Federation of Labor, Samuel Gompers; and their representative, who appeared before the commission and the Senate committee who indorsed this amended measure, is now the Senator elect of the great State of Minnesota, Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG. Its passage on the floor of the House was championed by that well-recognized representative of labor, still a Member of the House, Hon. DAVID J. LEWIS, of the State of Maryland. By the way, I will print at the end of my observations the remarks made by him on that occasion.

The Republican Party in its last annual platform declared for this species of workmen's compensation by a declaration in their platform favoring the enactment of "a generous and comprehensive workmen's compensation law within the commerce power of Congress."

To my mind no more important piece of legislation has ever been recommended since the administration of Abraham Lincoln than that recommended by the commission created by the Sixty-first Congress and indorsed by President Taft. During the first session of this Congress, as the gentleman, my colleague from Ohio, just referred to, a workmen's compensation bill was passed, but it covered Government employees only. Its benefits are extended to the railway mail clerks and other Government officials, many of whom have been and are being appointed for partisan reasons.

Why, then, should the Democratic Party refuse, why should the Republican Party refuse, why should this Congress refuse to enact a compensation law which will benefit upward of 2,000,000 toilers who build, maintain, and operate the interstate railroads of this country over which are transported the railway mail clerks and Government officials, especially when the compensation to be received on account of the injury or death by accident will be borne by the railway companies of the country? Is the labor of the railway employee less hazardous than the labor of the Government employee? Congress at this time is apparently earnestly engaged in an endeavor to shorten the working hours of 20 per cent of 2,000,000 toilers to whom I have just referred. Why should not Congress become as intensely interested in incorporating into the national statute a proposition designed to adequately compensate the thousands and thousands of crippled and suffering railroad employees annually injured?

Practically every foreign nation has provided some sort of compensation for those engaged in hazardous industrial employments, especially those engaged in the operation of steam and electric railway systems of their country, irrespective of the cause of the accident. Two-thirds of the States of the Union, recognizing the great importance of securing adequate redress for the thousands injured annually in industrial employments, have supplemented those old archaic systems based on the fault of the employer by enacting compensation laws based on the fact that injury and death have ensued while in the course of the performance of contractual duties.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I will.

Mr. DENISON. Can the gentleman from Ohio state approximately the number of men employed in the service in interstate commerce injured annually?

Mr. SWITZER. I think the joint commission to which I have referred says that upward of 100,000 of railroad employees are annually injured, and as the result of such injuries four or five thousand annually die.

In that connection I desire to say that the report also shows that the railway companies of the country expend something like ten or eleven million dollars annually in payment of personal-injury and death claims. If the measure that I have referred to had become a law, the railroad companies would have been compelled to expend something like $20,000,000 annually. The difference between the two systems would be this: Under the old common-law methods, the system based on the fault of the employer, not exceeding half to two-fifths of the number annually injured received any compensation, and not over 35 per cent of what was paid out ever entered the pockets of the injured employees, or, in the case of death, of the widow of the deceased. The remainder was expended in paying lawyers' fees and the cost of litigation. Under the measure defeated in the Sixty-second Congress $20,000,000 would have been distributed to the 100,000 annually injured and to the widows and dependents of four or five thousand who annually meet their death as the result of such injuries. The benefits of the bill would have been shared in by all the employees of interstate railways—section men, track-repair men, trackwalkers, switchmen, terminal men, bridge men, ticket agents, telegraphers, office forces, car-repair men, shopmen, mechanics, brakemen, conductors, baggagemen, firemen, and enginemen, and all others—in the event of injury while in service and by their widows and dependents in case of death.

As I stated, practically every civilized country of Europe, and a large number of the States of the Union, have enacted compensation laws establishing the principle that these injuries are to be considered as part of the risks of the employment and that the burden of the loss, or at least the greater portion of the burden of the loss, should be borne by the industry and not by the people disabled. It seems to me that the time has arrived when it would be well for this Congress to pass a compensation law, at least for the benefit of the employees of the interstate railways, if not for all interstate carriers of the country; and it seems to me that the progressive spirit of our civilization, especially along the lines of social justice, demands the enactment of a compensation law applicable to the interstate carriers of the country, providing adequate indemnity, certain and uniform rates of compensation throughout every State of the Union, for every injury and every death the result of accident in all lines of railway employment. The substitution of a humane, rational, and a simple system benefiting all who are injured for the complex, antiquated, and glaringly inequitable system which benefits only the few. [Applause.]

The following are the remarks of Hon. DAVID J. LEWIS, a Representative from the State of Maryland, on the floor of the House, March 1, 1913:

Mr. Speaker, in the coming year 90,000 are to be injured on our railroads and 10,000 killed. This is as much to be expected as the orderly operation of the planets themselves. Under existing law less than one-third of these victims will receive some $15,000,000, certainly not more than $20,000,000, with their lawyers to pay. Under the bill that is presented to the House to-night all the victims will be compensated and that sum will be lifted to from $48,000,000 to $60,000,000 as compensation to the victims of industry. [Applause.] We are confronted by a practical question. Are two-thirds of these victims to lose some $40,000,000 next year because lawyers would like to adapt this measure to the old legal remedial forms of procedure rather than accept it as an adequate principle in itself? It is hard on the lawyers as a class. I am a lawyer, and I want to say if I go back to the profession for my living it will be very hard on me. But it will be an act of justice to the soldiers of industry such as even this great body will seldom have an opportunity to make. [Applause.] (See p. 4502, pt. 5, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 3d sess., 62d Cong.)

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] such time as he may wish.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, Congress in the past years has appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for improvement of rivers and harbors that have been absolutely wasted, and still these bills are continually brought before Congress for consideration. While there are many worthy projects included in this bill it is loaded down with unworthy ones. This bill should be considered as all other appropriation bills are considered, and the localities deserving consideration should be given consideration by the committee, and those that do not deserve consideration should be stricken out. But this will not be done, for like all so-called pork-barrel legislation the just provisions go with the unjust, and places that should have no appropriations have to get them in order that there should be appropriations for deserving localities. I complain against the system of passing such bills in their entirety, and their approval by the President in their entirety. What we need is a few amendments to the Constitution, so that this kind of so-called "pork-barrel legislation" is impossible, and with that end in view, I have introduced a resolution providing for the amending of section 7, part 2 of the Constitution of the United States, so that the President may approve or disapprove appropriation bills item by item. This would be the first great step in the right direction. If it were known that the President would veto unworthy projects, in bills of this character, those kind of undeserving items would be left out of the bill. As it is now the President must either approve or disapprove this bill in its entirety. Take for instance the appropriation provided for Ashtabula Harbor in my friend COOPER'S district. A very worthy project, and he will be obliged to vote for the bill or be classed as a hypocrite. If the President had the power under the Constitution he could approve such an item as Ashtabula Harbor and disapprove those that were not deserving. All waterway improvements should be restricted to navigation and to places where the commerce justified it. Many of these projects are solely for the benefit of one corporation or concern. I shall vote against this bill as a protest to the system, hoping that something may be done in the near future to make pork-barrel legislation impossible. I shall vote against this bill although it contains an item for my city. I did not introduce the bill to provide for the appropriation for my city. I did not urge the placing of it in this bill. I did not appear before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to urge the placing of this appropriation in the bill, and as far as this bill is concerned, I come before the House with clean hands. Congress has been passing omnibus bills that have grown in size and extravagance with each succeeding Congress. I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] that the waterways and the railroads should be placed under one head as far as Government regulation is concerned, and thus whatever is done in the line of improving of rivers and harbors could be done in conjunction with the railroad system of the country, and be done where the greatest good would come to commerce. But I am told this old method has been the system of doing business of this kind for many years, and if a Member desires to get a worthy project provided for he must submit to bills of this character. I admit it has been the system, but Congress should do something to kill the system. There will be Members of this House who voted against the public-buildings bill who will vote for this principally because the rivers and harbors bill has an appropriation for some place in their district. A system that forces Members to do this is viciously wrong.

I shall not discuss the present condition of the Federal Treasury at this time other than to say that the Committee on Ways and Means are going to recommend an increase of 50 per cent on the inheritance tax. All I can say is that if this is to be done, I would advise those who are contemplating death that they better attend to it before this new tax becomes a law.

I had a provision in the public-buildings bill that carried an appropriation for Painesville, Ohio, in my district. I had introduced the bill, appeared before the Committee of Public Buildings, and, although I did not approve of the omnibus bill in which it was reported, I still voted for the bill, because I was responsible for this item in the bill. I could have sat quietly and voted against the bill and still my appropriation would have been provided for, yet I would have been a hypocrite. When I introduced the bill for a post office for Painesville, I was not acquainted with the system. I became an innocent victim but will not be such again.

A suggestion made by our distinguished Speaker when the public-buildings bill was before the House would apply very well in this bill. Rivers and harbors where the commerce justified it should be improved. Harbors where there were railroad terminals should be considered. Rivers where there were railroad facilities paralleling them should wait on localities that have poor transportation.

Projects are provided for in part, and no provision is made for the completion of the project. No project should be undertaken unless the plan has been carefully made for the ultimate completion of the project. The question of national defense should also figure somewhat, and in fact a good deal in these projects.

Of course, Governments can not conduct their business the way private concerns do. Perhaps if the initiative, referendum, and the recall applied to President and Members of Congress we might get better legislation. We recently provided for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people. I have heard of no complaint because of this change. Some people think the President should be elected for one term. I believe if he expects to run for a second term he will make a better official than if he knows he can only have one term. I doubt, if the President was not running for reelection last fall, that the Adamson eight-hour bill would ever have passed Congress and become a law. That was legislation in the right direction, and observe Members here are very watchful as to how the folks back home feel before they vote on propositions. A Member who lives in a wet district easily fixes his conscience so that he can vote against prohibition here, and a Member who lives in a dry district votes dry, although often his conduct is not in accord with his vote.

And so legislation goes on, and I expect will go on when we are dead and forgotten. But I trust that Congress will at this session do something to correct this great error of pork-barrel legislation by at least giving the President a right to veto these appropriation bills item by item, and thus take one step in the right direction.

It is interesting to note how Members of this House vote on certain bills. For instance, of the Members who voted against the public-buildings bill the following either voted to increase the allowance to themselves for clerk hire or were paired in favor of the increase:

Messrs. CARTER of Massachusetts, DALLINGER, DILL, DOOLITTLE, ELLSWORTH, FESS, GANDY, GARDNER, GLYNN, GREENE of Vermont, HICKS, JOHNSON of South Dakota, KEISTER, LOUD, MCARTHUR, MAHER, MILLER of Delaware, NOLAN, REAVIS, SCHALL, WALSH, WILLIAMS, WINSLOW, and YOUNG of North Dakota.

I shall watch with interest how many Members who voted against the public-buildings bill vote for this river and harbor bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COLEMAN].

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman and Members of Congress, on January 6, 1917, there was introduced in this House a bill now known as H. R. 19730, providing an eight-hour workday for certain railway employees, preventing a strike of such employees pending investigation and authorizing the President of the United States under conditions set forth to draft these employees into the militafry service of the United States. In so far as this bill seeks to provide an eight-hour workday it differs from the original Adamson enactment in that it does not attempt to fix wages and thus avoids a strong constitutional objection. It is not my purpose to discuss this feature of the bill nor the section pertaining to the military draft. But rather I invite the attention of the House to the provision relating to arbitration and to a discussion of the question of compulsory arbitration in general.

And in considering a compulsory-arbitration measure we are confronted not only with the right of the public to thus interfere with the private relations of employer and employee, but also with the practicability of such a law.

Now, it is apparent that a great coal strike, such as occurred in the anthracite regions of Pennsylvania some years ago, or in the Colorado fields more recently, or a street railway strike similar to that with which the metropolis of New York was a short time since afflicted, or a national railway tie up, necessarily causes great inconvenience to the public and affords grounds for arguing the right of that public to interfere through the law-making body to prevent such inconvenience.

No one, then, is going to defend the strike as a good thing in itself. On the other hand, there will be general agreement to the statement that it is a great economic waste. Members of labor unions know this just as well as the public do. They know also that to them it means hard work and anxious hours as they wait the uncertain outcome. And because of this they are averse to strikes and avoid resorting to them except in extreme cases, but when such cases do arise they hold it as their right to thus contend with their employers for the principle that may happen to be involved.

And, personally, I am rather pleased that they do so contend, for it indicates a strong feeling among the mass of workmen for the maintenance of individual rights in opposition to the radicalism of present-day socialistic tendencies. And argue it as you may, and let Socialist leaders, for political effect, oppose it as they will, the fact remains that compulsory arbitration is of socialistic flavor, and if adopted as a principle of our Government we will have entered into the borderland of that system which would destroy competition and make the State the owner of all.

In deciding our course as to compulsory arbitration, now that the election is over, it is to be hoped that we will be influenced by fundamental principles more than by the voting strength of labor unions. But, if influenced by the latter consideration in this particular instance, in my judgment justice will be more nearly achieved than it was by the passage of the Adamson wage-fixing law in the last session of Congress.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. MEEKER (during the count). I shall withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws the point of order.

Mr. COLEMAN. I wish here to say that the settlement or postponement of the threatened railroad strike of August last by the enactment of the Adamson law was in effect compulsory arbitration, and when the Federation of Labor and the railroad brotherhoods aided in its passage they also aided in forging the chains of a compulsory-arbitration law. And these organizations, which have grown into such giants of power, would do well to review the history and struggles of labor organizations of past generations before plunging themselves further into the clutches of Government authority.

PAST HISTORY.

It may not be out of place here to call attention to the fact that fixing wages by law is no new thing. In the middle of the fourteenth century an English law obliged men without means of their own "to serve him which so shall require"; the wages were fixed, and refusal to work at the rate was punished with imprisonment. In the middle of the sixteenth century a law was passed forbidding conspiracies not to work but at a certain rate, and later in the same century a further enactment provided that those not possessed of independent means or other employments were bound to work as artificers or laborers on demand, the hours of labor being fixed and authority given to justices to set the wages. Under George the First in the eighteenth century a law was enacted to punish with imprisonment journeymen tailors and other employees for entering into an agreement to advance wages or decrease hours of employment, while under George the Third in 1800 a similar provision was extended to all workmen.

English decisions throughout the eighteenth and well up into the nineteenth century held that it was criminal conspiracy for workmen to bind themselves together to enforce higher wages. This was the rule under the common law, and, as I have shown, many statutes were passed fixing the rate of pay, and any attempt on the part of the workmen to conspire against the statute rate was punished with imprisonment. Are these the conditions to which workingmen wish to return? Is the liberty which the workingman now enjoys, after years of toil and struggle, to be surrendered to the wisdom of legislative bodies?

In our country as in England during the first half of the nineteenth century attempts of workingmen to improve their conditions were punished as conspiracies. In New York as late as 1835 it was held that a strike of journeymen shoemakers to raise wages was injurious to trade and commerce and punishable as a conspiracy. In a Pittsburgh case in 1815 dealing with striking cordwaniers, in which the strikers were found guilty by a jury, the reporter in his notes has this to say:

> The verdict of that jury is most important to the manufacturing interests of this community. It puts an end to those associations which have been so prejudicial to the successful enterprise of the capitalists of the western country.

It was not until about the middle of the century that courts began to see another side to these controversies, and in the interpretation of the constitutional provisions making for the protection of individual rights recognized the justice of the demands of labor organizations for improved wages and conditions of employment and in an effort to secure the same the legality of the strike.

It was about this same time that labor unions, by reason of the changed conditions resulting from the development of our industrial system, causing master and servant to become separate and distinct parties rather than partners, were established in the sense in which they are now known. By this time England's unjust combination laws were so far modified through the influence of a fair public opinion as to permit workmen to organize for what was considered the legal aim of regulating wages and hours of labor by the right of the strike. And this right gained after years of struggle against the old combination and conspiracy laws they are not now willing to surrender and they can not afford to allow Congress to arrogate to itself the right to pass compulsory arbitration or Adamson wage-fixing laws and deprive them of their rights as individuals or of their rights by collective bargaining to determine the terms of their employment.

The right of labor organizations to strike is now generally conceded by the courts of this country, State and National; this is especially true when the object of the strike is to increase wages, fix hours of labor, or in other ways directly affect the conditions of employment. And this right was gained through the diffusion of the doctrine of individual and personal rights as understood by the founders of our Government, prompting, as this diffusion did, a struggle against the spirit of medievalism, with its class distinctions and antagonisms to the working class. And in our effort to keep abreast with the changed public opinion of to-day we must be careful not to abandon basic principles while seeking to interpret them in the light of present-day surroundings.

The modern labor union proceeds on fairly conservative lines and in the main is under the direction of able leaders, for which it is to be commended. Its object is the just one of protecting its members and improving their conditions of employment. And it is in the capacity for collective bargaining that its strength lies, and by reason of this power its members can demand and often obtain a fair share of the profits of the business in the form of wages. Shall we by law take this right from them and place them at the mercy of compulsory-arbitration tribunals and force them to work, as was done under the old English statutes, for the wages fixed by law? I do not believe that we should. Certainly such action should not be taken unless some great benefit is to accrue to the men involved or the public generally. And what good reason can be advanced to convince us that the arbitral tribunal can solve the problems at issue between employers and employees to better advantage than they themselves, in the exercise of their lawful rights to deal freely one with the other in the adjustment of their differences?

I argue that compulsory arbitration is wrong in principle, that it is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, that it is in violation of the individual rights of the members of labor unions, and that in the interest of industrial justice we should not deprive labor organizations in their collective capacity of the right to strike if need be to obtain fair terms of employment, and I further contend that under the conditions with which we are surrounded in this country compulsory arbitration is impracticable.

PUBLIC RIGHTS.

In thus contending I am not unmindful of the strength of the argument in favor of the right of the injured public to interfere in some measure in the adjustment of industrial disputes. Industries of different kinds are so correlated that a stoppage of one vitally affects others and often works great public injury. For this reason able men argue, and public sentiment in many countries supports them, that the public has a right to compel arbitration.

Most European nations prohibit in some degree workmen engaged in public utilities from striking. But we must not overlook the fact that in some of those countries these laws apply to the employees of state owned and operated railways and to other public works.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLEMAN. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman think that Congress has any authority to pass a law prohibiting a man from quitting work if he wants to do so?

Mr. COLEMAN. I do not believe that Congress has that authority. I believe that the Adamson wage-fixing law passed at the last session of Congress is unconstitutional, and I believe compulsory arbitration laws would likewise be unconstitutional. In this connection I want to say to the gentleman that in this city of Washington in December last there was an interesting colloquy between Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and Prof. John R. Commons, of the University of Wisconsin. In that discussion between Mr. Gompers and Mr. Commons the president of the American Federation of Labor asserted that compulsory arbitration was unconstitutional, and, among other things, said:

INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE.

I call the attention of this conference to the fact that there is a provision in the Constitution of the United States against involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime after trial and conviction. Therefore a law which would make strikes illegal must of necessity carry with it involuntary servitude. Compulsory service is unconstitutional and is un-American and makes for unfreedom.

In Arthur v. Oaks (63 Fed., 310), Justice Harlan, with reference to the restraining of an individual from leaving the personal service of another, said:

One who is placed under such a constraint is in a condition of involuntary servitude—a condition which the supreme law of the land declares shall not exist within the United States or in any place subject to its jurisdiction.

This is substantial authority for the contention of Mr. Gompers, and certainly justifies him in raising the question of constitutionality.

Mr. George P. West, in an article appearing in the New Republic, September 30, 1916, opposes the view of the editor of that publication in his indorsement of the President's railway program, and says:

We could disregard the objection that such prohibition constitutes the imposition of involuntary servitude, provided no substantial injury was inflicted on the man thus compelled to remain temporarily at work.

But would not very substantial injury be inflicted, he asks? He then proceeds to show how in the interim between the filing of the demands of the men and the submission of the report of the investigating committee great injury would be wrought to the employees by the discharge of some, by extensive advertising, and in other ways.

The editor in reply says:

We do not agree with Mr. West that compulsory investigation is the same as compulsory arbitration. We do agree with him that compulsory investigation imposed after the threat of a strike would, under present conditions, often work injustice to the employees in some occupations.

Our proposal is more specific and rests on certain presuppositions. It presupposes that unions should have already been organized and the right of collective bargaining recognized by the community. It presupposes that the nonarbitrable principles which must underlie labor controversies, such as the eight-hour day as a basis of wage computation, shall have been established in legislation.

And let me say that if the principle of wage fixing by legislation involved in the Adamson law is to be considered as established and is upheld by the Supreme Court, then I will have to agree with the reasoning of the editor. But I do not believe in that principle, and I do not believe in compulsory arbitration. The principle involved in either case is in contravention of our theory of government, which is designed to protect the fundamental rights of its citizens against legislative encroachment, and in this respect my attitude is consistent, and I call attention to the inconsistent stand of Samuel Gompers and the railroad brotherhoods in supporting the same principle in the Adamson law that they so forcefully condemn in compulsory arbitration.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COLEMAN. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman, if we have the power to prevent a man from striking, what distinction is there between that and the power to compel him to continue his work? If you compel a man not to strike, is not that in substance compelling him to continue on with his labor?

Mr. COLEMAN. As I said to the gentleman in answer to a previous question, I do not believe we have the right constitutionally to pass this legislation, and there is little difference between his former question and the proposition he has now presented, and I wish further to say, if we do have the right, if the law is enacted, I know of no way by which even the power of this Government could force 400,000 men to go back to their employment if they chose not to do so.

IS IT PRACTICAL?

I know that some of our leading publications are in favor of the President's program, believe that it is practical, and go so far as to advocate the compulsory enforcement of the award. One of these is the Independent or Harper's Weekly. It dwells upon the public interest and the suffering and distress incident to strikes, and, with reference to the milk strike in New York, says:

The public stood by helpless and suffered while two groups in the community fought out their commercial differences. * * *

And further:

The well-being of all should never be permitted to suffer because some special portion of the whole is seeking its own well-being in its own way.

It then proceeds to reason that if a solution is not found for a peaceful settlement of these disputes Government ownership and operation will be rapidly accelerated.

But it does not follow that a peaceful solution for these disputes is possible nor does it follow that compulsory arbitration will prove more workable or of better advantage to the public, nor does it follow that government ownership and operation would solve the problem. For if the Government had to deal with the great mass of employees it would not mean the end of strikes.

Perhaps military mobilization would accomplish the result, but is it possible to conceive of the people of this country quietly submitting to such a degree of Government authority over them in respect to purely civil affairs?

In discussing a report of a committee appointed by a prominent French society—the Société d'Etudes Législatives—in 1913, Mr. Heurteau, delegate general of the management of the Orleans Railway, strongly opposed compulsory arbitration and in answering the arguments advanced as to the successful operation of the Canadian act called attention to the Canadian Pacific strike of 1908 and the Grand Trunk strike of 1910, each lasting for a period of two months, and said:

Hence one could not say that in Canada and in England conciliation boards had formed an effective means for the peaceful settlement of labor conflicts.

In Australia compulsory arbitration has not put an end to strikes, and in that country the people are trained to the belief that Government is all powerful and can enact legislation in its sovereign power to compel obedience by all, while in this country we are reared in the atmosphere that individual rights, personal rights, and property rights are in a large measure protected from legislative authority, and will as a result be less inclined to accept as final the award of an arbitration board.

When interrupted by the gentleman from Washington a short time ago, I was discussing the laws in European nations with respect to compulsory arbitration, and in a strongly centralized Government like Germany we find that membership in trades-unions is looked upon as being incompatible with loyalty to the State.

In contrast with this we find that in England, where the liberty of the individual, as in our own land, is firmly established, trade unions flourish. And while recognizing the evils of strikes efforts to curb them have been confined to conciliation boards, and these boards served as the foundation for the Canadian conciliation and labor act of 1900, from which was developed the industrial-disputes act of 1907, after which the proposed law is patterned.

The reports as to the working of the Canadian disputes act have been more or less favorable, and yet it is to be noted that strikes have not been eliminated under its operation, and further that the trades-unions are strong in their demands for its repeal. It would seem but natural that with our larger industrial population, and the jealousy with which we look upon the exercise of governmental power in the private affairs of individuals that a similar law would not work as well with us as it does in Canada.

It is in Australia and New Zealand that we find the most radical legislation along these lines. In New Zealand and the Colony of New South Wales we find compulsory arbitration of a pronounced nature, but strikes still continue and are quite as numerous if not more so than in our own country.

Under the Canadian system of compulsory investigation and the Australian system of compulsory arbitration the strike remains, and when it does come the Government finds itself unable to compel a great army of strikers to return to their employment. Considering further that in Australia and New Zealand, the home of compulsory arbitration, the conditions have been most favorable to the successful working of such a law in that they are new countries and the period during which it has been tried has been one of rising prices and correspondingly of rising wages we should realize that the experiment does not justify our following the example.

Rising prices are naturally followed by rising wages, as is evidenced by the recent advances of wages in this country in many industrial concerns without any threat of a strike, as in the United States Steel Corporation; and the wonder is that this Congress, which so willingly voted to raise the wages of certain railroad employees 25 per cent, would not make some honest effort to increase the wages of Government employees to meet the conditions now prevailing as a result of high prices. If the Adamson law should be upheld as constitutional perhaps we will change the order of wages following prices, and in the future have prices follow wages. Just how far we will get in this direction remains to be seen, but it seems to be the trend of the times.

When we consider the vast difference in the conditions that surround Australia and New Zealand and those with which we are surrounded, the fact that the former countries are to a great extent isolated, while we enter into keen competition with the leading countries of the world, the immense difference in population and the rising market in those new countries during the period in which compulsory arbitration has been in vogue, it would seem to me that no good reason presents itself for the inaugurating of such a system in our midst. This reasoning is the stronger by reason of our being reared in an atmosphere in which the natural rights of individuals are held, or were until recently, as sacred as among the Romans. And in view of these considerations may we not well pause to inquire whether or not compulsory arbitration in our surroundings would work good or evil results?

LIMITED GOVERNMENTAL POWER.

It is true that our Government, though of limited legislative power, has gone far in recent years in the direction of State regulation and control, and we seem to be fast approaching the system of government against which the Monroe doctrine was enunciated as a protest as well as a protection to our institutions. Monroe in his famous message, among other things, said:

The political system of the allied powers is essentially different from that of America. * * * It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness.

In the Senate of the United States, on January 8 of this year, there was introduced a resolution to forbid Federal judges declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional, thereby seeking to establish in this country a government of unlimited legislative authority. Are we now ready to abandon our system of limited governmental power, which is the vital distinction between us and the Governments of Europe? If we are, then the Monroe doctrine and our boasted superiority must be abandoned in face of our surrender to the European system.

Unlimited legislative authority was the rule in Governments previous to the adoption of the Declaration of Indedpendence, which instrument breathed a new theory for the protection of the inalienable rights of man, which theory was incorporated in our Constitution and is still, in my humble judgment, so far in advance of the old idea that it should be carefully guarded and sacredly preserved.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLEMAN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think there is any danger of the bill that has been introduced in Congress passing Congress and becoming a law?

Mr. COLEMAN. I do think there is danger. The fact is that the President of the United States is making an earnest effort to have that bill passed at the present session of Congress.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. COLEMAN. I do.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think the President is letting up just a little bit on that?

Mr. COLEMAN. No. I will say that I do not; that I believe the President of the United States is earnest in his endeavors to have this bill passed.

I will say further, with reference to the President of the United States in this connection, that if the Adamson law, passed in the last session, is to be upheld as a constitutional law, then we must give credit to the President for a consistent program of legislation in insisting on the compulsory arbitration law. But, my friends, I do not believe that that law passed in the last session is constitutional. I do not believe that it can stand the test before the courts. I believe it violates the same principle as the compulsory arbitration law violates, and that neither one of them should be placed on the statute books in this country.

Mr. FESS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. COLEMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I agree with you entirely that compulsory arbitration will be a very bad thing. I think I agree with you entirely, too, that we are not ready for Government ownership in operation of railroads. But what should be our duty here when a scene takes place again such as took place here in the latter part of August, choosing between a threat that the country will be tied up if we do not pass certain legislation? Do you not think that compulsory arbitration under those circumstances will be justified?

Mr. COLEMAN. No; I do not believe that compulsory arbitration is any answer to the base surrender of this Congress to the 400,000 railroad men. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. That is good.

Mr. COLEMAN. If it is wrong it is not to be enacted for any reason.

Now, I admit if the Adamson wage-fixing law is to be the law of the land we must come to compulsory arbitration, as there is no other way out, unless, as the gentleman says, we go to Government ownership. And let me say right here in that connection that if we did go to Government ownership that would not mean that strikes would be at an end. Suppose the Government owned and operated the railways, does that mean the men would not strike if the wages that they asked for were not sufficient, in their judgment?

INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS.

In our rapid change of ideas we must not wander too far from basic principles and we should not forget in our movement toward greater socialization that the preservation of individual rights is still a great concern of government, and to this end we have our government of legally limited power. And in considering the virtue of individual and personal rights we should ponder carefully before taking away from the members of labor unions their rights, either in their individual or collective capacity to make contracts with their employers and to use all fair and lawful means at their disposal to procure good wages and reasonable hours of labor.

Of course, if it be granted that we have the authority to fix the wages of employees in public-service corporations doing an interstate business, as we attempted by the Adamson law in the last session of Congress, then I agree, as already stated, that the President rightly contends for arbitration of a compulsory nature. But, believing that we do not have that right and that the Adamson law, in so far as it attempts to fix wages, must fall as an unconstitutional enactment, I contend that we ought not to pass a compulsory arbitration law. And whatever the interest of the public in the controversy that public must remember that they can not deprive employer or employee of their individual rights without thereby endangering their own liberties.

Compulsory arbitration violates the principles that underlie the American system of government and is an unwarranted interference with individual rights. The fact that other Governments have similar laws is not a compelling reason for us to follow in their footsteps. The systems are different and the difference makes to the advantage of our system.

If we enter upon the dangerous practice of fixing wages by law—and this is what compulsory arbitration does, just as it was done or attempted by the Adamson law—then we are going to place, of necessity, a strain on our legislative department too great for it to bear.

LABOR.

The American Federationist of December, after making effort to justify the Adamson law, says, with reference to the compulsory arbitration proposed by the President:

It is a revolutionary proposition totally out of harmony with our prevailing institutions and out of harmony with our philosophy of government.

And in this I agree with them. The strange thing is that while so correctly judging this proposition they should have been blinded to support the Adamson law which to a greater extent than compulsory arbitration is out of harmony with our philosophy of government.

The passage of that bill, so contrary to the spirit of our institutions, followed, as it is now being followed, by the sturdy advocacy of a compulsory-arbitration law, proves the correctness of the reasoning in that same December number of the American Federationist, as follows:

In human institutions when a wrongful course has been pursued it inevitably is held or driven on to its logical conclusion of error.

I can not but feel that the members of the American Federation of Labor and of the railroad brotherhoods would have been infinitely better off if, instead of supporting the Adamson law and the administration responsible for its enactment, they had steadfastly adhered to the doctrine theretofore long advocated that government had no right to interfere with the regulation of wages or hours of service of adult workmen.

How well the members of the executive council of the Federation reason when they state:

Problems of industrial justice and redress for industrial wrongs can not be worked out by laws. Human relationships are involved, and these can be adjusted on a basis of equity only through cooperation and mutual consent.

I agree with them, and believe in the principle underlying this reasoning, and because of this belief I voted against the Adamson law, and for the same reason will vote against compulsory arbitration, involving, as it does, practically the same issue as the Adamson law. The precedent of the Adamson enactment and its support by labor unions that had previously and consistently opposed such legislation will prove detrimental, not helpful, to labor organizations; and the time, I trust, is near at hand when they will acknowledge their error in having aided a measure so vitally wrong in principle.

THE CANADIAN ACT.

I have already referred to the Canadian act, and said that the proposed law copies after it. This act, passed in 1907, is applicable to industries connected with public utilities, and declares that strikes and lockouts may not occur legally in these industries until after efforts at adjustment have been made through the official machinery provided.

The board consists of three members, two being appointed by the respective parties and the third by the labor minister. Penalties are provided if any strike takes place before the board recommends a solution.

The State of Colorado has adopted the principle of the Canadian law, and one of the members of the industrial commission of that State, as set forth in the Outlook of October, 1916, writing to that magazine with reference to this Colorado law, says:

It has done more to promote industrial peace than anything ever tried in this State. Had this law been in operation in the Nation last month I believe there would have been no such crisis as confronted us at that time.

The Outlook editorial says, in response to this statement:

There is, in our judgment, good ground for this opinion.

They then proceed to advocate a compulsory-arbitration law that would go further than the Canadian act by enforcing the award of the court of arbitration.

It must be remembered, however, that the Colorado act has been in effect only since 1915, and has not therefore been subject to any real test. It must be noted also that in August last the trade-unions of Colorado were united in their opposition to this law and pledged themselves to work for its repeal. Nor have I seen any evidence of the employers being pleased with its provisions.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman have any suggestion to make that might lead to the stopping of strikes? Does he know of anything that would stop them?

Mr. COLEMAN. I know of no other way or no better way than the provisions that we already have in the Newlands Act. I believe in voluntary arbitration. It is in harmony with our Government institutions, and we ought to abide by it and encourage it in every way, as they do in England. Under the Newlands Act we have provision and machinery for the voluntary settlement of these disputes between employers and employees, and I do not know of any better way, I wish to say to my friend, than voluntary arbitration for the settling of these disputes in consideration of the principles of individual liberty, of which I am a firm adherent. And I look with concern upon the rapidity with which this Congress is foregoing these principles and marching headlong into socialism under the leadership of the other side.

VOLUNTARY ARBITRATION.

As I have said, in our country, as in England, legislation has been confined to voluntary arbitration enactments. Now, there is a vast difference between voluntary and compulsory arbitration. In the former all of us believe, and the principle involved is in harmony with our theory of government, especially the preservation of individual rights.

We now rely on the Newlands Act for the settlement of grave industrial disputes, and it is probably an improvement over the Erdman law which preceded it in that it provides for six arbitrators instead of three, and therefore does not leave the decision of an important question to but one person. Perhaps the most important settlement under its provisions was that of the firemen's and engineers' strike in the West in 1914, with which decision there was great dissatisfaction among the men.

If dissatisfied under voluntary arbitration as is now provided, will there not be greater dissatisfaction with the award under compulsory provisions, and will not the men resent the more the fact that they are forced to accept an unsatisfactory award? And, even though the power of the Government is back of that award, does it insure against the strike?

There is such strong opposition to compulsory arbitration, both among employers and employees, that it would seem a most unsatisfactory law and one that it would be most difficult to enforce. Under these circumstances is it not pertinent to ask as to the practicability of a compulsory law?

Labor is united in its opposition to the recommendation of the President relative to arbitration, and yet it was labor that largely contributed to his reelection, and inasmuch as he had previously in a message to Congress clearly stated his views on this subject, may it not be asked with reason if labor does not now find itself in a somewhat embarrassing position.

To labor then I say, yours was a short-sighted vision when you indorsed the Adamson wage-fixing law involving the same principle that underlies compulsory arbitration, and you can not retain its fruits without thereby endangering your liberties.

To employers of labor who, striving under the difficulties of severe Government regulations to successfully operate their businesses, and who for this reason may be prompted to favor the same exercise of authority over the individual rights of their employees, I wish to sound this warning: You can not afford to further encourage Government interference with private rights, and you should be more concerned in protecting the basic principle than in seeking by legislation to control the rights and liberties of your employees.

To my mind the Government already exercises a too great control over private business, and has by the severity of its restrictions prevented railroad construction that is required by the business interests of the country. More, it has by reason of this control arrayed one business interest against another and caused various groups to demand Government aid for its own interests and Government restriction of the interests of other groups. And if this aid and restriction is continued as a permanent governmental policy it must lead of necessity to State socialism.

Personally, I am a firm adherent of individual and property rights, and am opposed to the law-making body encroaching further upon them by Adamson wage-fixing measures or compulsory-arbitration enactments. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend by remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIVERS AND HARBORS BILL.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may not be interrupted until I have talked 25 minutes, if the Chair will notify me at the end of that time, because I wish to make a statement as clearly as possible, and at the conclusion of 25 minutes I shall be glad to receive any interruption.

A question was presented immediately after the meeting of the House to-day in which it was suggested that a great publication in New York had sent out some copies of my speech under frank. Let me say that I paid for every one of the copies and furnished them to anyone who asked for them, and these were asked for, and I presume the franks were sent by my office. They would not exceed, in number, 500, I am satisfied. I shall be glad to pay the postage bill if any possible criticism can arise, because I do not want it to be accepted as a condition or precedent for anyone else.

Let me add this: I believe that the magazines and newspapers of this country that are fearlessly striking at waste and extravagance, which many of us concede to-day exists in legislation, are performing a great public service. They are awakening public opinion on this kind of omnibus-bill legislation. I may say again, as I have said in the past, criticism of projects does not always fall upon those who accept it cordially. At this time I desire to express to the chairman of this committee, who stated to-day he was about to leave us, my hearty appreciation for his kindness extended to me at all times and under all circumstances. He is an optimist, and he certainly is a courteous man under all conditions. I realize that some things that have been said and done in committee have not been calculated to bring us close together, but he has always been generous in his treatment and in his criticisms, and I for one am very sorry indeed that he is to leave this House, because I think he has been a valued Member since he has been here.

Let me add to that, Mr. Chairman, that there are a number of members of that committee who will not be with us next time. Some of them have at times felt that criticisms aimed at particular projects were not fair from their standpoint. In committee and out those gentlemen have been very generous with me—very kind—and I have not a single objection to find to the treatment that has been accorded to me by them throughout. I do not object to personal criticism. I am not on trial. It is the policy of this Congress that is to be placed on trial, and that is what is being discussed to-day in the public press. Are we doing right to pass bills like the one before us and one like the public-buildings bill?

It does not answer to say that this man or that man is inconsistent in his statements. That is beside the question. The only thing to discuss is, Are we legislating aright? And, if not, can we improve the conditions?

We have just passed a $38,000,000 bill for public buildings. The Treasury Department said that 200 and more of those projects ought not to have been placed in the bill because they were extravagant. Those facts were shown on the floor. Yet, not one item could be stricken from the bill. We all know why it was. We do not have to question each other to ascertain why we could not strike them out—some of those bad items.

Then, here is a bill of $38,000,000 more, the same kind of a bill in some respects, where fully half of it, as I believe can be demonstrated, will be waste. But it is going to pass this House, and all the support that you can bring against any single amendment will not serve to strike it out of the bill.

The chairman of this committee said I was a pessimist. Ah, that may be true. But there were over 140 other pessimists in this House last time when they sought to defeat the bill, and practically half of the Members of the Senate of the United States were pessimists last time, because they came within 1 vote of defeating the bill. They were pessimists from that standpoint. But is that a standard of pessimism?

I have attempted to point out waste from a sense of duty in a kindly spirit, because there is no personal feeling in the matter whatsoever, and I believe it is so understood by the House. We are facing a deficit of $300,000,000, it is said. The chairman of the committee answers that by saying this is a wealthy country. That is true. But the people in my State are paying taxes to put through these public buildings and waterways, and they are paying direct taxes. If the projects are necessary and desirable they ought to do it. But if it is waste it is wicked to compel those people to pay this money in face of the facts. It is criminal to compel them to pay for waste by direct taxation, and that is what I object to.

Mr. Chairman, this bill reaches $38,000,000 in round numbers, but that is not the entire bill at all. Those figures do not begin to state all that is in the bill. Nine million dollars is for new projects. Oh, yes; that means for 80 new projects that were put into the bill between January 5 and January 11, with only five legislative days intervening; 80 additional new projects put in the bill. Eighty projects distributed all over this country, and they will bring votes to the bill. The new projects have been placed in the bill on top of a couple of hundred or more old projects. Some of them doubtless are good. The New York projects may be good. I presume some of them are all right. But you never could get your projects for New York until we begin to open up on these wasteful projects. Some of the projects are not good and are not defensible. In Germany they compel contributions in most cases unless it is a governmental function. Here it is a grab. The strongest influence is the one that counts. The greatest pressure is brought to bear. I can mention you cases where Senators and Congressmen go before the different boards of Army engineers and insist that their projects should be taken into consideration. Why, how can a Senator or a Congressman know anything technically about these projects? Yet that influence is directly exercised, according to these reports.

I have suggested in this statement of mine, presenting the minority views, that each project, beginning on four rivers, which takes $18,000,000, is, according to the demands of the Army engineers. I say "demands" advisedly. In all of these four river projects not a single dollar was stricken out by the committee. It was an autocratic demand. I can not conceive of it being anything else, except where I moved to strike out $800,000 on the upper Mississippi River. I have not technical knowledge, but my motion went through unanimously in spite of the engineer's recommendation.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] contends that we can not do otherwise than follow the engineer's recommendations, because the engineers are authority for determining, and when they say $2,000,000 for the upper Mississippi or $6,000,000 for the lower Mississippi, or a million dollars for the Beaufort Canal, those are their figures, and we can not change them. In some cases their figures have been cut, but only to a slight extent, and in the one case I presented—$800,000—reached nearly one-half of the entire cut on 200 projects.

The chairman of the committee said I made some statements that he believed were incorrect in the minority report. It is true I did my work hurriedly, but I challenge the chairman to point to misstatements in that report. There perhaps may be misstatements in it, but the chairman has not shown them thus far.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is the minority report?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will satisfy the gentleman before long.

Mr. FREAR. When the chairman was discussing comparative appropriations on page 2, he forgot to read that they were for old projects. I put it there expressly. When I was speaking, on page 2, of the various harbor improvements, that was expressly stated. There may be errors in preparing a report of this kind, and probably will be in preparing a long speech such as appeared the other day. No man is infallible. But if there are any errors, they were not made consciously. I am glad to correct any error that may be here.

But that is not the question. The question is, Is this method of legislation right? Is it right to legislate by these omnibus bills as we are doing, putting a little appropriation here and a little one there, and so on, all over the United States until the whole country is covered in one bill? Then the votes are tied together and all must stand or fall together. During the discussion of the bill I shall have only a few minutes to talk on each project, and I do not wish to take the time of the House unnecessarily. I do not expect to change votes here. I do expect, however, to try to make a record, and that record will be used elsewhere, as it has been used in the past. I want that record to be correct and honest. If there is any mistake made, I shall be glad to correct it. There is no object nor gain in misstating facts.

As to the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, for instance, of which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] thinks so much—and I do not blame him—for of course he and I have different angles from which to view these questions. He feels that it is a very important project, and he is very anxious about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FREAR. In a moment. He believes that it is a national project. It is a project that means a part of some great scheme of preparedness. He wants not a 12-foot canal, or a 25-foot canal, to meet Admiral Benson's request, but it will soon be a demand for a 35-foot canal in order to make connections with the Delaware River. What is the estimate on that? About $22,000,000, if I remember correctly; but that does not meet the preparedness plan. Right on top of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal plan Admiral Benson and Army engineers say it is equally necessary to put a canal through New Jersey so that the fleet can go from Philadelphia to New York by way of this inland waterway.

That canal will cost $45,000,000 for a 25-foot depth; but if you are going to build it so that it will carry great vessels of the Navy and to be of practicable value, it will cost, presumably, $75,000,000, because the cost increases rapidly with the depth.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows there must be a beginning.

Mr. FREAR. And that is only a part of the canal preparedness scheme, because from Norfolk down to Beaufort, 200 miles, if you are going to have a 35-foot canal there to accommodate large craft, you are going to spend $50,000,000 or more. If it is a scheme of preparedness, make it mean preparedness. If it is a question of commerce, then let it stand upon its own bottom. That is the Delaware & Chesapeake new project I am speaking about. I wish I had half an hour to discuss it. I have read the reports quite thoroughly. And let me say just one thing that shows up the unfairness of this bill. It provides an initial payment of $1,300,000, when Army engineers say $2,500,000 must be appropriated as the first expense. And that additional amount will go on in the Senate; but here, in order to keep down the appearance and the total of the bill, we appropriate only $1,300,000, when every one of us knows it must be added to in the Senate, or it might as well be taken out of the bill. That is a $22,000,000 project; only $8,000,000 for a 12-foot project, but the larger sum is for a deeper channel, to be of preparedness value.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think the Government would save money by making the larger appropriation?

Mr. FREAR. I will discuss that at the proper time in the five-minute discussion. There is the Oklawaha River, a project which is a new project put in the bill with the Kissimmee and others. That is a project that carried one thousand seven hundred and sixty-odd tons of commerce after deducting logs last year and after an expenditure of about $100,000 by the Government. Now we are asked to expend $733,000 more upon that project. I should like to discuss that later on. I can not now.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I have said I would yield in the last five minutes of my time. I desire to continue my statement now, so as to get it before the House.

There is the upper Mississippi River, which flows past my district. It carries a demand from the Army engineers—I say a demand, because that is what they make. Just think of it. I can, by a motion before our committee, ask to have it cut down $800,000, and it is done. That is the only case, I assume, where a Member did such an act—my statement before the Army engineers. And that stands practically alone. What do you think of such a scientific method of determining the needs of the upper Mississippi? The upper Mississippi River, according to the report of one of the best captains on the river—I do not think there is any better man—says that $30,000 a section on six sections, or $180,000, is all that is needed for improvement, and that to-day the river is more dangerous than it was before a dollar of the $28,000,000 had been expended. You say, "Have you any authority for that?" I am going to submit authorities on some of these matters that you will admit are good. I am going to submit the authority of the boatmen, pilots, and others on that river over their signatures as to the condition of the river. The river does not carry 10 per cent of the commerce that it carried 40 years ago. I know it because I have been there, and I know it from the statements of the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce and of commercial boards, and I think the same is practically true of the lower Mississippi, which has had $88,000,000. The upper Mississippi has had $28,000,000. Take the Missouri River, that has had $20,000,000. What have we gotten out of that? I see my good friend from Kansas City, Mr. BORLAND, sitting here. I am sorry to oppose that project, but it seems to me a waste of money, and that is the only reason why I oppose it. I do not think the Government is getting value received. That is the only reason I oppose these projects.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I have said I would yield in the last five minutes of my time. I can not understand how we can consistently favor the Missouri River project when so able a man as Col. Townsend, who to-day is the chairman of the Mississippi River Commission, agreed that it is not a worthy project. The Chief of Engineers wipes them all out and puts the project on the map, and so it stands to reach an eventual expenditure of $35,000,000. And that is only one of them. It does not stand alone. That is the reason I say what we need is an investigation by a board that is unprejudiced, of all these projects, to get at the question thoroughly. Your good harbors, if you have them, will be taken care of; your good rivers will be taken care of. But you can not lose sight of the fact that the Missouri River and the Mississippi River and the Ohio River have all lost commerce rapidly in the last 40 years.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. In the last five minutes of my time I will yield. These rivers have lost commerce, and during that time we have appropriated $150,000,000 to the Mississippi River. We have appropriated or will appropriate $90,000,000 for the Ohio River, and we are not getting the commerce. I realize that there are land-reclamation projects along these streams, and if that be the purpose you can carry it anywhere; but for navigation, which is what we propose in this bill, I can not see how you can possibly justify it.

Mr. Chairman, at the close of the bill I am going to offer a substitute which proposes to place a certain amount in the hands of the Army engineers. Gentlemen have asked me, "Do you believe they will divide it properly or that they will be fair?" No; I do not. I concede that they will not. I am not satisfied with their allotment. Then why do this? Because the total amount in this bill, if you count the new projects, reaches $76,000,000, to which we are committed, and that, with the $38,000,000, reaches $114,000,000, substantially, and if you can put $15,000,000 in their hands and require them to distribute it and allot it to the necessary old projects, it ought to be a saving, had it not? Because the limitation would compel them to spend less. Some of it may be wasted on poor projects, but it is better than to appropriate $38,000,000 or $45,000,000, as it will be before it gets through the Senate, probably, because some of the things that are not put on here will be put on there.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this proposal does not meet my approval very strongly, and yet it is the only way that I can see whereby you can make the correction. That is the way the Senate did at the last time; they put in a lump-sum appropriation, and these appropriations were distributed, not fairly according to navigation needs, I concede, but there was a saving of $42,000,000 by the defeat of the other two bills. That is my proposal briefly, in order to substitute for the bill before us.

I do not claim to be an expert in these matters. I simply say that I want the Government to receive full value for what it puts into these rivers and harbors all over the country. That is all, and that is something which is being brought home to us every time a bill of this kind comes up. Congress ought not to legislate on the matters of determining the commercial value of the different projects. How can you do it?

Some of the members in this committee—and I am one of them—were not present but at few meetings, and there are $38,000,000 appropriated. I have read every new project in the report, and I want to ask everyone who stands up to defend them how they can defend $76,000,000 out of 160 new projects substantially; how can you determine as to the merits in five days? Oh, they say, we have the reports before us. Yes; but who is able to read them, with all the other matters that you have had here; all of us engaged in legislation, endeavoring to do our duty? Some are engaged on other bills, trying to do their duty on other matters. It needs experts to study these questions throughout the year, analyze them, and see what the Government is going to get in return for these enormous expenditures. I can not believe that it is possible for us to continue this kind of legislation by omnibus bills much further.

Under the five-minute rule I will discuss a few proposed amendments. I do not care to take advantage of the time now, although I want to question some matters and discuss different items; but I do not intend now to discuss them further—the general provisions of this bill. I now offer to answer any questions so far as I am able.

Mr. HULBERT. I do not understand the gentleman to mean to say that he believes there are $76,000,000 of new projects in this bill?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no. Forty-seven million dollars for new. I meant the old and new projects together.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he subscribes to a statement printed in the New York Sun that there are $46,000,000 of new projects in this bill, two-thirds of which were worthless?

Mr. FREAR. I never made a statement of that kind, and I do not know.

Mr. HULBERT. I did not say that the gentleman made it, but does he subscribe to that statement in the New York Sun?

Mr. FREAR. I submit to the House that that is a very unfair question. What is the next question?

Mr. HURLBERT. The gentlemen knows that more than one-third of the new projects are for the State of New York?

Mr. FREAR. I never formed any estimate in regard to that. What is the next question? It may be that some of the New York projects ought not to be put through at this time.

Mr. HULBERT. The gentleman has read the reports. Is be able to state any New York projects that ought not to be put through?

Mr. FREAR. I will say that the Army engineers refuse to say whether the New York projects need immediate improvement there or not. That is the one fault of the present system; they refuse to say, and appeal to us to read the reports and determine ourselves.

Mr. HULBERT. I am asking the gentleman what he thinks.

Mr. FREAR. It makes no difference what I think. Any further questions?

Mr. HULBERT. The gentleman does not care to answer my question.

Mr. FREAR. No; it is a needless question that can not be intelligently answered by Members with our slight knowledge of all the facts in each case.

Mr. HULBERT. Is it not a fact that the committee before the Christmas holidays made up a tentative list of the new projects to be included?

Mr. FREAR. No; they made up a list of old projects, but we never knew whether they were going to put new ones in or not, and some members of the committee voted against the new projects.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman one more question; I perhaps was one of them, and I voted against the Oklawaha River. Was the gentleman present, and did he vote against taking on that project?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes; I was opposed to it before the gentleman was ever a Member of Congress. The Kissimmee, too.

Mr. HULBERT. Did the gentleman vote against it in committee?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I submit that the gentleman ought to observe the rules, and it is not proper to ask a Member on the floor how he voted in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the gentleman in his minority report on the Missouri River project says that the cost was $23,000,000 and that it will cost $35,000,000 to complete it.

Mr. FREAR. The present project?

Mr. BORLAND. That is what I want to know. I think it is only $14,000,000 for the new project. The engineers' report shows that the present project would cost $4,400,000.

Mr. FREAR. More than that. The gentleman must not take up too much of my time.

Mr. BORLAND. Why does the gentleman state it $23,000,000?

Mr. FREAR. Because it has cost that amount thus far for the development of 19,370 tons of commerce in 1914.

Mr. BORLAND. No; $4,000,000 has been spent.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, that means nothing under the particular project. You dredge a stream down to 5 feet in one year and the next time under some other project you dredge it down to 6 feet. That is a new project. It is the same stream, but you are deepening the channel and it is a new project. We have spent $23,000,000 on it. Is there any other question the gentleman wishes to ask?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. I see the gentleman recommends that the bill be cut to $15,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Is that because he thinks if $15,000,000 be appropriated it would be used on all good projects, or because he thinks it is better to waste $15,000,000 than to waste $76,000,000?

Mr. FREAR. The reason is this. The Army engineers distributed in 1914 in one lump-sum project $20,000,000 and a second time, in 1915, $30,000,000. There has never been a Member who has risen on the floor to say that those lump-sum distributions made by the Army engineers did not meet all of the exigencies or the imperative necessities of that time, and I believe $15,000,000 if fairly distributed will do the same without any criticism as to the necessities of navigation.

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. FREEMAN. In the substitute which the gentleman proposes to offer appropriating the lump sum of $15,000,000 does the Board of Engineers have any power to devote any part of that sum to new projects?

Mr. FREAR. No; and, following out that suggestion, I would be very glad to have any Member on this floor present a new project for that purpose. It could be done about as intelligently as under the present system.

Mr. FREEMAN. A great many new projects may be better than old projects.

Mr. FREAR. I have referred to that. Some of the old projects, in my judgment, should be abandoned and some new projects ought to be added. There is no doubt about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, for the last two or three years I have been listening to and reading vigorous attacks on river and harbor bills, and now, inasmuch as I voted for the last of these in the belief that it was a good bill, I wish to direct the attention of the House to what two men prominent in the public life of the country said last July about that measure while it was before the President for him to sign or to veto. One of these two prominent men, the Secretary of War, the other Brig. Gen. Black, Chief of Engineers. Now, presumably the President of the United States was very much interested at that particular time, the middle of the presidential campaign, in signing only such measures as thorough consideration should show ought to be signed. This particular bill had been bitterly attacked not only upon this floor, but also generally throughout the country. The President, as gentlemen will remember, waited 10 days after the bill had been presented to him before he gave it his approval and made it a law. Meanwhile he had asked the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers to prepare and submit to him their opinions as to the merits of the bill, these opinions to be based upon a thorough investigation of each of its provisions. The Chief of Engineers was an honor man at West Point. He now bears, as I said, the rank of brigadier general in the United States Army.

Here is the letter of the Secretary of War giving his opinion of that bill, which had been so savagely denounced upon this floor and elsewhere. I invite careful attention to what the Secretary told the President:

JULY 24, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I return to you herewith the river and harbor bill, which I have gone over with great care and upon which I hand you a report made by the Chief of Engineers with certain attached memoranda. The net result of this examination is to show that in this bill, carrying $42,886,085, $611,200, or about 1½ per cent, is, in the judgment of the Engineer Department of the War Department, regarded as economically indefensible, although in the case of some of these expenditures the improvements are probably not primarily for navigation purposes.

I concur in the view expressed by Gen. Black that the direct loss to the United States as a result of suspension of work, were this bill not to receive your approval, would be greater than the amount appropriated for improvements of a doubtful value; that is to say, upon all the great river and harbor projects of the country, if work were suspended, there would be loss due to the breaking up of existing organizations, the care of idle plants, etc., which would be very serious. Should this bill receive your approval, the department would have so much work on its hands that it would probably be obliged to delay some portion of it, and, of course, in selecting that to be delayed, the work of doubtful economic importance would be postponed, so that the entire $611,200 marked as questionable would probably not be expended in any event.

Respectfully submitted.

NEWTON D. BAKER.

And here is also the special report, dated July 24, 1916, of the Chief of Engineers, made after a thorough examination of each item in that bill:

JULY 24, 1916.

From: The Chief of Engineers, United States Army.
To: The Secretary of War.
Subject: Report on pending river and harbor bill.

1. In compliance with your verbal instructions, the following report on the pending river and harbor bill is submitted:

2. For the past 8 or 10 years Congress has, in general, followed the policy of adopting no new projects except such as were favorably recommended by the Chief of Engineers. The recommendations of the Chief of Engineers are in each case based upon a careful examination and survey to determine the nature and cost of the improvement to be undertaken and a full study of the probable benefits to be derived. The study is such as would be made by a careful business firm to determine whether it would undertake a new business venture.

The study is made by the district engineer and reviewed by the division engineer and the Board of Enginers for Rivers and Harbors before being acted on by the Chief of Engineers.

Who in all the United States, as Senator Burton once said when he was a Member of this House and chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, can constitute a more disinterested and intelligent board than is the Board of Engineers of the United States Army, a board wholly outside of business and of political life? Gen. Black said further:

3. Prior to the time mentioned above Congress adopted many projects which had not been subjected to such a careful study and which were not recommended by the Chief of Engineers.

The time there referred to, when projects not approved by the Chief of Engineers were adopted by Congress, was 8 or 10 years ago. He then proceeds:

As a rule it is certain of these projects which have been subject to recent attacks. To determine whether the attacks were justified, a proviso was inserted in the river and harbor act approved March 4, 1915, directing a reexamination of all existing river and harbor improvements to determine which, if any, of them should be modified or abandoned. The results to date of this reexamination are set forth in brief in memorandum No. 1 herewith. Owing to lack of time the reports on these recommendations could not, with few exceptions, be made available for the consideration of Congress in connection with the pending river and harbor bill.

4. An examination of the bill shows that it contains certain items which were not included in the annual estimates of the Engineer Department, or which were included for a less amount than the bill provides. Memorandum No. 2, inclosed, cites these items in detail, and shows that, without exception, the added items and the increased amounts were introduced into the bill on recommendation of the Chief of Engineers based upon facts that came to light after the annual estimates had been submitted. There are also many items for which a less amount is provided than called for by the annual estimates. No discussion of them is deemed necessary.

5. Memorandum No. 3, inclosed, gives a list of all the items in the bill which may be classed as of doubtful value to the interests of navigation when subjected to the tests usually applied by the department. A final analysis shows that, of the total, $42,886,085, carried by the bill, $611,200 (about 1½ per cent) is not economically defensible in the judgment of the Engineer Department for navigable purposes, however meritorious it may be for other purposes.

6. To conclude, the items in the bill which can be justly condemned are few and the amount provided for them is small, as compared to the loss to the commercial interests of the country that would result from the failure to enact a river and harbor bill. Moreover, the direct loss to the United States as a result of suspension of work and care of idle plant pertaining to improvements of unquestioned merit would, as shown by the experience of 1914, in less than three months amount to more than is provided for the doubtful items.

7. It is recommended, therefore, that the bill be approved by the President.

W. M. BLACK,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

And yet the whole country had been led to believe that that bill of a year ago, for which many of us voted, was a thoroughly bad bill, whereas the truth, now clearly revealed, is that we then voted for a bill which it was wise to enact into law, a bill which a subsequent complete, impartial investigation of all of the facts showed was plainly in the public interest. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I consider that the present river and harbor bill before the House has more to commend and less to condemn in it than any bill during the past four years. I have been one of those more or less critical of numerous items in the river and harbor bills, but I think that the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and the quotations that he has read from the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, apply more nearly to the bill before us to-day than they did to the one in regard to which he was making that comment. I am very glad to see included in this bill large and generous but fair appropriations for the great harbors of the country. [Applause.]

The items which I have previously criticized in river and harbor bills have been those just such as the gentleman from Wisconsin referred to, namely, the comparatively smaller items, but, nevertheless, the ones which have brought upon this House and the Congress the comment and criticisms which have been so generously bestowed during the last few years. We all recognize, Mr. Chairman, that it is very much easier to criticize than it is to praise, much easier to pull down than to build up, much easier, perhaps, unconsciously to get into a critical spirit carrying with it sometimes lack of absolute facts. It is perhaps to a certain extent within that line that a good deal of the existing comment and criticism on river and harbor legislation is based.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. On pages 28, 29, and 30 of the report is a proposed bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. Has the Committee on Rivers and Harbors ever given much consideration or any to that bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, so far as I know, the gentleman who introduced that bill has never asked the committee for a hearing upon it. It would seem to me, as a member of the committee, if I were personally interested in legislation I would at least ask my own committee to give me a hearing on a bill I had introduced, but I may be in error in making that statement.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. FREAR. I am not questioning the gentleman's assertion, but with the impossibility of getting favorable action on the bill from the committee I thought it was absolutely useless. It was a tentative bill used for a constructive measure.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts just one further question, and that is, Whether he has given much consideration to the underlying principles of this bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], and whether he thinks, if the plan of that gentleman were adopted, it would be better than the plan we are proceeding under now?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Michigan that I read the bill several times, but realizing it was not to come before us, and the gentleman who introduced it himself said he did not want to bring it before us, I have not given it the serious consideration I should have done had it been actually before the committee for action. I might say, however, in this connection, that I neither approve the principles on which the bill is based nor do I approve of carrying in this bill the so-called commission proposition. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that a correction of some of the evils such as have been discussed on this floor lies right here on this floor. They start here, and they start here from the fact that the committee at times puts in projects many of us do not approve of, and then the House itself declines to strike them out. Now, if we are the cause of this trouble, we have the cure right in our own hands. My criticism of the suggestion, not in the suggested bill of the gentleman from Wisconsin but of the so-called commission that appears in the present river and harbor bill, is that you are going around in a circle. You are not accomplishing a single thing in the enacting into law of the so-called commission. You are going further. You are giving to men who are supposed to be experts in river and harbor matters the authority to study kindred propositions, in a large measure, as I see it, not germane to the subject of river and harbor legislation at all, and you are expecting as broad a commission as that, with the power and authority that this bill gives them, to be able to report to Congress next December. The proposition is absurd, as I see it, on the face of it.

I was speaking, Mr. Chairman, about some of our big harbors. I am very glad indeed to indorse all these harbor projects, starting with Boston and continuing on down the coast—New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Savannah, Charleston, Jacksonville, Tampa, and so on—around to the Gulf and on to the Pacific coast. I think every Member of this House can conscientiously vote for every project carried in this bill for the improvement of the harbors and centers of our commerce. Being from Massachusetts, although I represent no part of the Boston district, I naturally am particularly gratified that the committee has continued as one of the new projects carried in this bill the extension of the depth in Boston Harbor to 40 feet.

There is no place where the Government money will be better expended than in that great harbor, second in importance to New York only of all the harbors of this country, and fifth in international importance. There is every reason why Boston should be favored with the best of commercial opportunities. The State of Massachusetts is now expending, as this House I think well knows, the enormous sum of $3,000,000 in constructing the largest dry dock on the Atlantic coast. If I am not misinformed within a few weeks the State officials having that work in charge have been in this city and have accepted the suggestion from the Secretary of the Navy that an annual rental should be paid to the State by the Government in order to secure the rights to the use of that dock for our largest battleships. We have there the great Charlestown Navy Yard. We have the great commercial development of the shipbuilding plants. The imports and exports are enormous, some figures I shall ask permission to insert in my remarks in the RECORD. So much for the general commendation of the present bill. Anyone can pick flaws in it. During my brief experience in Congress there has been very little legislation in which some of us sometimes can not pick flaws, and this is one of them. There are numerous projects in the present bill that I personally do not approve, but I have every respect for the judgment of the men who do approve them. I voted on this floor and voted in the committee for some of the inland water projects, but the more I consider that subject the less these projects appeal to me. If there is one meritorious it is the Delaware and Chesapeake, but then the question comes up whether Congress should be called upon to pay out $1,300,000 for the purchase of what is pretty near, not absolutely but practically, an abandoned canal simply to secure the right of way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I realize the gentleman wants to interrupt me so as to speak of the commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think as the gentleman is fair in his other statements he ought to be fair in this one. This is not an abandoned property; it is a going property.

Mr. TREADWAY. I said that, and I will say to the gentleman if he had heard all the statement I made I do not claim that it is an abandoned project.

But nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, the moment the Government pays $1,300,000 for that project, that is an instance of where the purchaser is naming the price. No one—our committee and no Member of this House and no Government official—has ever been able to present to Congress what the owners of that property would sell for. Up in New England, where we trade back and forth among each other, once in a while trade a horse or a cow or some of the farm products, the man that has the product to sell is the man that makes the first price. It may be an up price, but, nevertheless, it is something to start on. But here we have absolutely nothing to start on from anybody who has any ownership or control over that canal, other than for State officials to be quoted as saying that probably the State ownership, which is not worth a dollar, will be contributed to the Government. That is as near as I—a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors—personally have ever gotten any information as to the value of that property.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it possible that in Yankeeland, from which the gentleman comes, it is possible to get the dead to fix a price upon their property?

Mr. TREADWAY. Get the dead? Well, if it is as dead as all that, I do not think Uncle Sam ought to pay $1,300,000 for it. I think I am nearer right than I thought I was when I said it was a dead issue.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is a value there. The people who have owned the property have passed away, and condemnation would settle the whole proceeding. The gentleman should put in his speech a fair statement of the situation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not a fact that some official presented a letter to our committee in which it was said they owned the canal, but that the bonds were distributed wide cast and the stock was held wider cast, and consequently no one was in a position to name a price? I would like very much if the gentleman would insert the letter to which I refer, as I think it will corroborate what I am stating.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to doing that, because it confirms what I said, that the ownership of the property is distributed among the States, and has been handed down from those who have passed away, so that the only method is to proceed by condemnation to take the property.

Mr. TREADWAY. That will inform the country that it is not worth anything or these heirs would have been glad to put a price on it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is where I differ with the gentleman.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then they trade differently in the Quaker State than we do in the Bay State.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They trade fair in the Quaker State.

Mr. TREADWAY. If I made any statement about the Delaware Canal other than it was a meritorious proposition, I would be entitled to criticism.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman in his enthusiasm a while ago made a statement saying that Boston was the second greatest port in the United States, and he ought to know that Philadelphia has long since exceeded Boston.

Mr. TREADWAY. It must have been since the year 1915, because the statistics prove that Boston was the second port of importance for the commerce of the year 1915. Possibly Philadelphia——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman wants the statistics in the RECORD, I will be glad to put them there, to show that Philadelphia is the second port in the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Nevertheless, I will claim, in spite of the intrusion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and his evident acceptance of the fact that his property is not worth very much, that from a commercial standpoint the intercoastal waterway in which he is so deeply interested is the best of the lot, so far as I know, and I am not praising it very much when I say that. [Laughter.] I do not honestly think a right of way through there is worth $1,300,000 as a starter. That is just the beginning.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I regret to say, if the gentleman will permit me, that the gentleman has never passed through that territory, and we have been unable to prove to him personally that what he states is an inaccurate observation of the situation.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will put my statement up against that of the gentleman in the judgment of the membership of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We will be very glad to let it go at that.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, the gentleman will get the funds, because the scheme is in the bill, and I am going to vote for it, along with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a concession.

Mr. TREADWAY. Not very much of a one. I would always rather be with the gentleman than against him, because usually his judgment is very good.

Now let me call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to one feature wherein it differs from some of the others. This is a new project, and the appropriation is to start the indefinite expenditure for deepening the canal for through commerce and all that sort of thing. To-day the claim is made that it is desirable as a secondary line of defense. Well, with the amount of water that is passing through there you would not want to sink a very large submarine in it and expect it would get covered up, because it would not be. It would be sticking in the mud. Such a claim as that is absurd on the face of it. But as to the other inland waterways, I will say that I am sorry to be obliged to differ with my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] in his opinion of the merits of the one so dear to his heart. That is an adopted project in which we have put, I think, something over $2,000,000. It is 25 per cent completed, and therefore it will take something like $6,000,000 more to complete. It is not worth it in dollars and cents to the United States Government. That is my criticism of the whole line of inland waterways, unless the Treasury of the United States is overflowing with surplus and you want to find some way to spend your money.

There is another large project taken on in the bill before us, which means the expenditure of a large amount of money before its completion. I refer to the adoption of a lock and dam system on the Cumberland River. It, too, in a general way is an excellent project, but not to my mind at the present time, so far as our finances are concerned. It has not yet been demonstrated that the Government is getting due return for any of these enormous expenditures on lock and dam systems. Of course the best one in the country that has been adopted is that on the Ohio River, not yet completed. It will be some years yet before it will be completed, and until it is demonstrated on the Ohio River that such projects mean a good return on the investment of the Government I say let us go slow in taking on any more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I have one minute more?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. TREADWAY. There are several other things I should like to speak of, Mr. Chairman, but I realize that it is impossible now to go into them fully. I want simply to say this, that no man in Congress regrets the departure from it in the next Congress of the distinguished chairman of our committee [Mr. SPARKMAN] more than I do, one of the newcomers to Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak for this bill, with special reference to the appropriation for the Mississippi River, and to advocate the necessity for its continued improvement, to the end that it will shortly become one of the greatest avenues of commerce in the United States. The city of St. Louis is located upon its banks. Recently the people of that city completed and dedicated a great municipal free bridge. That city is now constructing a modern municipal dock for the loading and the unloading of boats and barges. With its completion and the addition of other city docks and terminals, which are sure to follow, there will be a great change in the amount and kind of traffic upon this river. At the present time only about 150,000 tons are transported upon the river and nearly 55,000,000 by rail. The great development of river transportation will come about effectively and quickly, regardless of the other demands for deeper waterways. We are going to take advantage at once of the means at hand.

We are beginning the transportation, soon to be greatly increased, of our freight from St. Louis to New Orleans by barge liners, and at New Orleans they will be loaded upon ocean-going vessels which will carry same to South America and the Far East. Monopolies of Atlantic and Pacific coast cities of the trade in China and the Far East will soon be a thing of the past. St. Louis, the greatest manufacturing city of the Middle West, is fast becoming an important factor in this trade, and with the use to which we will soon put the Mississippi River for transportation of our traffic, our city will increase in importance. Its population will soon be doubled. Its financial and industrial conditions, now unexcelled by any city of its size, will have a stupendous development. We of that city and of the great Middle West are fully awake to the importance and needs of improving this great river by keeping open a channel sufficient for the purposes indicated, as well as to protect the present levees and build new ones, so that the overflows and floods may become a thing of the past. This all will indirectly reclaim vast quantities of rich land, now known as swamp lands, for cultivation. In my judgment the most important phase of this whole matter lies in the opportunity it gives to us of the Mississippi Valley and of the Middle West to participate in the great development of trade with China.

What about China and our opportunities for trade there? What about St. Louis and its ability to participate in this trade by making use of the Mississippi River as I heretofore indicated? First, something about St. Louis.

It is recognized now as one of the greatest manufacturing centers in the United States. In speaking of St. Louis I include East St. Louis now as a part of our industrial city, since the two cities have been connected by a great free bridge. With the new conditions that will come about St. Louis will be one of the greatest steel-manufacturing centers in the country. It is now the greatest open-hearth steel-casting center of the country, if not of the world.

As an evidence of this, let me call your attention to some of the principal plants of this industry, which include the Commonwealth Steel Co., at Granite City, Ill., with annual consumption capacity of 40,000 tons; the Scullin Steel Co., within St. Louis's city limits, also able to use 40,000 tons annually; the two plants on the east side of the river of the American Steel Foundries Co., taking in each year another 80,000 tons; the National Enameling & Stamping Co., with an annual consumption at its Granite City plant of 20,000 tons; and the Alton plant of the Laclede Steel Co., requiring still another 10,000 tons each year to run to capacity. Then we are manufacturing pig iron into finished products, two large plants being devoted to these purposes, to wit: The Missouri Malleable Iron Co., with an annual consumption of 20,000 tons of malleable iron; the St. Louis Malleable Casting Co., with an annual requirement of 10,000 tons; the St. Louis Car Wheel Co., affiliated with the Southern Wheel Co., 10,000 tons; and the American Car & Foundry plants. St. Louis is fortunate in having all the coal, coke, and electric power needed to facilitate this and like industries. As to terminal facilities, no city has St. Louis surpassed in that respect. Why should not our city participate in the great increasing trade in China? Our city is capable in every respect. It is a city with more than 1,000,000 people within its industrial district. Forty million live within a radius of 500 miles. It is the largest inland city in the United States and fourth in manufacturing. It has now over 3,200 factories, and its products average over $500,000,000 a year. The city has 19 miles of river front, and the greatest opportunity in the world is at our door for river transportation. St. Louis manufactures many things that are needed in China. We excel in many of these products in quantity and in quality of any place in the United States. We can send our products by water to China and bring back in the ships things that we can use here in our factories and mills. Now, as to China and our opportunities there.

The war in Europe must and will end shortly. Practically all of our exports at present are going to the European countries engaged in the war. This will not be the condition when the war ends. An economic alliance of European powers will be put into effect as soon as the war is over. The United States will not be in this. This virtually means that there will be no opportunity for our manufacturers to find markets in Europe for their products. We must look elsewhere, and the question is, Where will we find it? If we do not find new markets, our business will decline and our gold reserve will dwindle away. We all know that our phenomenal prosperity at this time, as well as the fact that we have such a great gold reserve, is due to the war. It will not take long after the war is over before adjustment, alliance, and so forth, in Europe will seriously affect us. Therefore we must put ourselves to work in order to find the new markets and bring about the necessary conditions that will enable us to take advantage of them. The Government of the United States must, and I believe will, do its part. One of the things it must do is to enact a law such as the Webb Act, which recently passed the House of Representatives and is now pending in the Senate. This would permit the utilization and cooperation of our manufacturers to cope with the combinations of foreign rivals, who are united to resist American competition. In other words, this would repeal those portions of our antitrust law that forbid combinations, with special reference to foreign commerce. We should permit Americans to cooperate in the development of our foreign trade. Congress must grant this authority. Then our Government must take a more active hand in helping American trade by providing more in the way of buildings and officials in foreign countries to assist in this development. I speak now specially with reference to China.

With fair and just laws by the Congress of the United States, with the resumption of traffic on the Mississippi River, and with the proper spirit on behalf of the men of means and ability of our city to handle this great question there can be no doubt but what St. Louis will reap a rich harvest of trade with China. It will make St. Louis greater than ever as a manufacturing center. It will bring to our city many new enterprises and increase our products. It will give employment to hundreds of thousands of people in our city—and, I might add, there is no better place to encourage people to come to live than St. Louis. Its climate, parks, schools, churches, and so forth, are as fine as can be found anywhere. We must bring together in St. Louis and its adjacent territory the manufacturing, agricultural, natural production, and the transportation and banking elements, who are and can be made interested in the American foreign trade. We must then obtain the necessary accurate and detailed information of the changed conditions that are taking place in the world markets. We must continue to have foreign trade. It now amounts to billions of dollars. We must not lose all with the close of the war. We must find new fields, and the greatest field is China. Then there must be ships for the transportation of our products on the Pacific. I have reason to believe that as the commerce increases ships and facilities will also increase. This has always been the rule, and it will be so now.

The American people should not hesitate to do their full duty in meeting the situation, for it was only a short while ago that we were bordering upon an industrial panic. Workingmen were unemployed, and there was scarcely any business. Then the war came. Our markets were drawn upon for the armies of Europe. Our factories, mills, mines, and farms began straining their utmost to supply the demands there because of high prices obtainable. This we have been doing ever since. Our foreign trade reached $6,000,000 for the year ending July 1, 1916. We are so engrossed with stupendous foreign trade that has come to us from Europe as a result of the war that we are not giving enough attention to the hereafter. I hope, therefore, that the men of America will proceed in actually planning for the trade in China.

China is friendly to the United States. It wants to do business with us. We have always shown our friendliness for that country. We returned the Boxer indemnity. The Chinese Government set apart that fund, after we returned it, and now uses the income from it to educate Chinese boys in the universities and colleges of the United States. This enables many young Chinamen every year to take back to their country with their diplomas from our American universities the American ideas of business, and so forth. China is a country of great wealth. It has a population of nearly 450,000,000 people and an area of 4,300,000 square miles. There is not any doubt but that it is the greatest market in the world. Wonderful development is going on in China. The great Hankow-Szechuan Railway will soon be completed and will reach a population of 78,000,000 of skillful, hard-working, and peaceable people. This number of people is only a portion of the total Chinese, but it is larger than the population of any other country except the United States, Russia, and India. China needs more railroads. It should have at least 350,000 miles of railroads. It now has only 6,000.

China can be made a great market for the boot and shoe industry of St. Louis and other cities in the United States. There are 400,000,000 pairs of feet in China, and they are beginning to wear American shoes. The proper cultivation of this trade will bring to the United States enormous business in this line alone. China has a great hide industry. We could take to China our shoes and bring back their leather. We produce many other things that China uses now and will use in great abundance, such as hats, caps, shirts, clothing, gloves, neckwear, underwear, chemicals, jewelry, hardware, millinery, surgical instruments, railroad supplies of all kinds, and so forth. China is importing to-day over 200,000 pairs of shoes annually.

The people in the northern part of China are discarding their native shoes and are adopting leather shoes. The United States has but little of this trade at the present time. It will not have any of the great increase that will come within the next few years unless it enters heartily into the importance of the situation. They are erecting many splendid buildings in China to-day. Building supplies of all kinds are needed, as well as elevators and hoisting machinery. Last year two merchants came from Hongkong to the United States to buy $1,000,000 worth of tools and hardware. Our manufacturers were so engrossed in making munitions for the armies in Europe that these merchants had great difficulty in getting their order filled. There is a great demand in China for bicycles, steel plates, copper, brass, sheets, needles, braid, soaps, washbasins, enamel ware, small metals of inferior quality and price, and chemical products of all kinds. Practically all of these things we make in abundance through modern and up-to-date machinery, with the most efficient skilled labor in the world. Most of these things we make in St. Louis. Why not increase our trade a hundredfold by going to China? China has things that we want and need, and we ought to encourage its importation. They can sell us tea, camphor, hemp, cordage, lacquer ware, and so forth. China is a wonderful country, and is waiting anxiously and with outstretched arms for American business. American manufacturers, bankers, and engineers must do their part, unless they wish to see this country lose its share of the trade with China. We can not hesitate nor delay our duty in this respect much longer. China's great industrial future and history is being rapidly made. It will only be a short time until its sluice gates of wealth are fully opened up. If we are not on the ground then, our chance is gone. There are great opportunities for the bankers in the United States to help China to develop her wonderful resources as well as to finance American manufacturers who wish to take their goods to China to sell. It will be very remunerative to the bankers who do this. Chinese are people that believe in fair dealing. They want what they ask for and are willing to pay the price. Very few bankers have ever lost any money through the Chinese. Bankers ought to encourage foreign trade. It is to their interest. They should give their assistance and help in this direction.

Our opportunities for trade with China are better than those of any other country, because of the fact that the Chinese people are specially friendly to the United States for the reasons that I have stated, as well as for the fact that it was the United States that brought about the "open-door" policy with respect to that country, and which—I am advised by Hon. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, under date of January 9 last, in answer to an inquiry from me as to what the conditions are at the present time relative to citizens of the United States trading with China—still continues. He says:

> In reply I have to state that American citizens enjoy in China by treaty the same commercial privileges that are accorded to persons of other nationalities.

It was Secretary of State Hay who insisted upon the maintenance of the "open-door" policy. Efforts have been made to supersede this policy to the disadvantage of the United States, but the American people will not look with favor upon the action of any country that seeks to deprive us of our rights under that fair and just policy. China is particularly pleased and benefited by the fact that the United States has championed and been responsible for the "open-door" policy. It has saved the Chinese Empire.

The United States has for a long time been doing some business with China. It reached its highest point in exports in 1905. This was due to a large increase in the importation of American cotton goods. Our poor showing in our trade with China is due entirely to the fact that we have not tried to obtain it. With all the advantage on our side we are letting Germany, England, Japan, and other countries make inroads upon the commerce of China. If we put it off too long we will not be able to get in. It is true that America has made some good starts. The Singer Sewing Machine Co. has gone about introducing its products in a businesslike and successful way. This is so as to the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. Some typewriter companies, the General Electric Co., and some automobile manufacturers are making successful entries into the trade with China.

The United States has helped to make history for China. Let us continue to do so. The history of the world is that of trade development. We spend much money in sending missionaries to China, but honorable trade relations with these people will no doubt do as much for their good as will that of the missionary or educator. Trade and civilization have always kept step. This was so as to Egypt, Assyria, Rome, Greece, Babylonia, and Carthage. It has followed the victorious armies and crossed the Atlantic with Columbus. It will go with American commerce and trade to China, and there we will find the greatest opportunities for both. That the Chinese people have appreciated the Christian teachings of the American Nation there is no doubt. She needs it greatly to-day in many sections of that vast people. China also needs us to help open her wonderful resources. She has vast mineral deposits that have hardly been touched. In one Province it is said that they have enough coal to supply the world for a thousand years. Altogether it is said that coal exists in at least 15 Provinces in China. At present 10,000,000 tons of coal is being taken out of the mines annually. Iron, pig iron, and precious metals are to be found there. Thousands of tons of raw jute and sisal are produced there and exported to foreign countries. Millions of tin cans are made in China annually by hand. Up-to-date machinery is needed for this and like industries. A Chinese workingman can turn out about 25 tin cans a day. One of our modern automatic machines will enable one man to turn out forty to fifty thousand similar cans in a day. One of the things needed in China most of all is up-to-date machinery.

American manufacturers who have engaged in business in China are making money. A rope factory there has had its stock to increase from $100 to $312 and has paid 25 per cent dividends on the original investment. A tobacco company is paying 45 per cent, a sugar company 15 per cent, a paper and pulp and mill company 10 per cent, a flour mill company 10 per cent, a cement manufacturing company 22 per cent, etc. China is a wonderful land. The whole world is watching it. It is the wide-awake people that will help to bring tremendously to the forefront this country. Those who aid will reap a large harvest financially, and at the same time help the Chinese people themselves. The people of the United States have always been equal to every responsibility. Will it meet this, the greatest opportunity of modern civilization, or will they leave it to people of other nations? The United States Government is doing its part. It must continue to do so and help the American manufacturers and American bankers to enter into the trade with China on as favorable terms as the Governments of England, Germany, and other countries grant to their people. What has the United States done? We built the Panama Canal to help to get to the markets of China. We took over the Hawaiian Islands as a further help. We have the Philippine Islands, which is an additional assistance in this respect. Between Hawaii and the Philippines we have Guam. We are working now to put upon the Pacific ample ships. We are appropriating money for the rivers and for the harbors, so that the commerce of the inland States and cities, like our own, can have water transportation.

If we do not take advantage of all these things it is our own fault and our own loss. In the city of Manila, the Philippine Islands, alone there is great opportunity for the manufacturers in the United States to carry permanent stocks of goods of all kinds, and which can be drawn upon from time to time to support the trade of China. This is an opportunity for American manufacturers, and gives them an advantage in the Chinese trade that can not be secured by any European country. No country of Europe has a base so near or a territory anywhere near as large that will enable it to carry a large supply of goods. The American business houses, therefore, should make arrangements to carry their stocks of goods to Manila and then have agencies in the various markets of China. American manufacturers could establish branch factories also in the Philippine Islands to manufacture goods for the Chinese trade. With all these superlative advantages and opportunities open to us we should not hesitate longer, but awaken to our responsibility and our chance to many times double our foreign export trade. Let the "Rich trade of the Orient" be ours. Let us not pass slightly the opportunity of the "golden future" in obtaining our share of "the great commerce of China's teeming millions shortly to be developed."

Some 50 years ago a distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. William H. Seward, made the following prophecy: "The Pacific Ocean, its shores, its islands, and the vast region beyond will become the chief theater of events in the world's great hereafter." This prophecy has already been fulfilled. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall vote for the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, but I do not want my vote construed as an approval of the past and prevailing methods of spending the public money for rivers and harbors improvements. I believe that many of the items in this bill are wasteful and extravagant, and I shall gladly support any just plan of reform in appropriating funds for our waterways.

But under the present system the only way to secure badly needed improvements is to pass a bill like this which is now pending. I do not believe that the projects deserving assistance from the Government should be made to suffer because of the sins of others.

There is included in this bill an appropriation of $98,000 for maintenance and improvements of Ashtabula Harbor, located in the nineteenth Ohio congressional district, which I have the honor to represent. This harbor is one of the most important on the Great Lakes. Each year millions of tons of iron ore from the mines in the Lake Superior region come into this harbor and are distributed therefrom to the iron and steel industries of the Mahoning Valley and to other parts of eastern Ohio and western Pennsylvania. It is about 120 miles from Ashtabula to Pittsburgh, and throughout those 120 miles we have a teeming hive of industry. There the great iron and steel mills are located. There are thousands of men in the Pittsburgh and Youngstown districts employed in the iron and steel industries that are dependent to a great extent on the products that come through Ashtabula Harbor. There are also thousands of railroad men who look for their livelihood to the products that are shipped to and from that harbor.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I have only four minutes left. There are also millions of tons of coal shipped annually from this harbor to furnish heat and power to the great Northwest.

It is absolutely necessary for the economic development of this harbor that the improvements proposed in this measure should be made. The report of the United States engineers shows this conclusively. The money which it is proposed to spend will be used for dredging the harbor so that large lake vessels may continue to use it, and for extending a breakwater so that the washing of sand into the harbor may be checked. Under present conditions this washing of sand into the harbor requires continual dredging at a large expense to the Government, and it would be a measure of economy to provide for extending the breakwater.

In 1913 the tonnage of Ashtabula Harbor was 15,743,375, according to the report of the minority filed in opposition to this measure. There can be no question as to the importance of the harbor or the need of the improvements. Therefore, in justice to not only the thousands of people at Ashtabula and in the iron and steel industries of my district, who are directly affected by the condition of this harbor, but also to the millions of consumers of the products of the iron ore, and the coal which passes through the harbor, I can not do otherwise than vote for the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield back any time?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my purpose to occupy any part of the time allotted for general debate, but would prefer to bring up the few items upon which I desire to be heard when the bill is read under the five-minute rule. A reference, however, in a New York City newspaper yesterday to the fact that of the total amount of new projects in this bill at least two-thirds are worthless, has prompted me to speak briefly at this time.

First of all, I desire to call attention to the fact that of the $47,050,112 in new projects which this bill authorizes, $18,370,000 cover items in the State of New York, of which all but three projects are in the port of New York, and that the total comprises approximately 40 per cent of the whole amount of the new projects carried in the bill. So that, according to the computation of the New York City newspaper which I have referred to, there must be included among the remaining two-thirds of worthless projects Boston Harbor, $1,145,000; the Schuylkill River, Philadelphia, $1,649,000; Baltimore $876,000; Norfolk, $840,000; Savannah Harbor, $1,920,000; Tampa, $1,425,000; Mobile, $1,030,000; Honolulu, $1,537,000; Lake Washington, $657,000; Grays Harbor, Wash., $700,000; Richmond Harbor, $771,000; Los Angeles, Cal., $626,000; Ashland, Wis., $270,000; and Green Bay, Mich., $110,000.

I do not believe that even my distinguished colleague on the committee [Mr. FREAR] will contend that any one of these projects may be classified as worthless, but rather I believe if it were possible to press the question for a direct answer he would willingly concede that each and every one of them is meritorious and entitled to favorable consideration.

So that, added thereto, the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal, the total amount of new projects included in this bill, which I venture to predict not even the most strenuous foe of the passage of this river and harbor bill could question, we find a total of $40,324,273, leaving approximately $7,000,000 of which the greater part can be readily justified by anyone, and all of which have met with the approval of a majority of the committee.

It might very well be that if some members of the committee who have undertaken to criticize these items on the floor under the searchlight of publicity had attended regularly the meetings of the committee, and particularly while the subject of new projects was under consideration, and shown anything like the same spirit and exercised the right as a member of the committee to vote on these projects—and I say this mindful of the rule, which I was admonished to observe this morning, for I believe that I can make this statement without committing an infraction of that rule—that some of the items complained of would not be present to be objected to.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize, from the standpoint of the cities located upon great harbors, the importance of the passage of this bill. In the minority report submitted by my colleague he calls attention to the fact that the city which I have the honor in part to represent, with the great tonnage of 100,000,000 tons per annum, substantially 1 ton for each person in population in the United States, there was only $40,000 appropriated for Ambrose Channel and $210,000 for continuing the project for the improvement of the west side of the Hudson River at New York. And yet neither he or anyone else can successfully contend that the committee have not allowed every dollar the Army engineers asked for and can profitably expend during the coming fiscal year.

Mr. FREAR. I concede that; but the point I was trying to make was that it was a waste of money on other projects.

Mr. HULBERT. I am going to get to that waste. The difficulty with respect to the appropriation of money for great harbors like New York is that this Congress can not appropriate the amount of money to meet the commercial necessities of the occasion because men like the gentleman from Wisconsin have stood upon the floor and raised the cry of "pork," and made it impossible to pass through the Senate bills which contain new projects, and without the adoption of which it is not possible for this House to appropriate money absolutely needed in great ports upon the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If it were impossible for us to supply the needs, which I would support any time, is not that a suggestion and a good reason we should change our method of procedure?

Mr. HULBERT. I have advocated a change in the method, but I am dealing now with the method that is now in use under the rules of the House as adopted upon its organization. Take the East River, for instance, and no one doubts the necessity for improvement, and everyone appreciates its commercial importance. In 1914 the commerce transported on the East River had a value of $1,500,000,000. In 1915 it was over $4,000,000,000. Everybody realizes the importance of that improvement from the standpoint of naval preparedness in order to give vessels of the Navy ingress and egress to and from the navy yard from Long Island Sound, as well as the Sandy Hook route.

But there has not been, except in two special cases that were made, one at the last session of Congress and the other in the previous Congress, totaling a little less than $1,000,000—there has been no appropriation made for the improvement of the East River in nearly five years, because the Army engineers recommended to Congress that the improvement which was being made under the project was adopted in 1868 for a 26-foot channel, and which was outgrown in 1888, was economically inadvisable. It is not possible to secure further appropriations for improvement of that great waterway until you pass a bill which contains the new project recommended by the Army engineers.

We have another item in New York that I want to call attention to because of its urgency, not to us any more than to the whole country. The city of New York has recently constructed, at a cost of about $3,000,000, one of several piers, which they propose to build. It is located on the east side of the Hudson River, at Forty-fifth Street, in the Borough of Manhattan. The fact of the matter is that at that point in the river there is a bar which extends from Thirty-fourth Street to Fifty-seventh Street, over which a depth of 22 feet of water obtains. This pier and those projected are intended to serve the convenience of the largest trans-Atlantic liners now afloat or in the course of construction. These vessels have a draft of from 38 to 40 feet, and you can realize the impossibility of utilizing that pier and others which we intend building when the depth of water at the approaches is only 22 feet. So I urge upon you that these and other projects of equal importance justify the passage of this bill, although I shall be glad to see and will vote to strike out any items which I opposed in the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman from Washington consume some of his time?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the Chairman kindly notify me when I have talked 10 minutes?

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it was not my intention to speak during general debate, but I think one of the challenges made by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] ought to be answered. He practically makes the challenge upon the floor of this House that the statements he made in his minority report are correct. There may be no single, direct statement that is not correct, but taken as a whole it is one of the most misleading documents, in my judgment, that was ever presented to this House. I think I will show the gentleman a place or two where his misleading statements have done far more damage in the country than if he had made a direct misstatement of fact. Attention has already been called to where he started out and said:

> Nowhere will be found evidence of a wasteful method in Government affairs to be compared with the autocratic demands of the Army Engineers.

The Army engineers, as we know, have nothing whatever to do with it. If the gentleman was going to build a house and asked a contractor to figure on it and he came and presented what he thought to be a correct statement of what it would cost it would be just as much a "demand" on him as the Government engineers make in these cases. But I do not care so much about that; but there is one statement in this report that directly reflects upon the membership of that committee, and I feel that it ought to be publicly answered. I want to call the attention of the House and of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the statement he makes on page 10 of this report and then to show how far he is from the truth. He says:

> After five legislative days' consideration of these new projects by the committee, together with the transaction of other important business, including hearings pertaining to old projects and new, and a proposed resolution, the pending bill was reported out of committee on January 11. This information is all a matter of public knowledge, although the method of selection and distribution of 60 new projects, aggregating $47,050,112, appearing in the 1917 bill is improper to discuss or comment upon.

Now, what is the direct insinuation of that sentence? What would you think of a libertine who had been seen several times in company of a woman who should say, "It is not proper to discuss the character of women among gentlemen. They do not refer to those things. Therefore I will say nothing about her." Could anything be more damning to the reputation of the woman? Yet here is a member of this committee who says that $47,000,000 were distributed in five days, but it is not proper to comment upon the methods used in the committee in the distributing of this money. I say an insinuation of that kind is unworthy of the gentleman from Wisconsin. We must admit that he is an honest man and that he is an intelligent man, and he must understand the meaning of the English language——

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And when he spreads broadcast a statement of that kind to the newspapers of this country it is only fair to assume that he puts upon it the construction that the man of ordinary intelligence places upon it.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. FREAR. I did not intend that, and I do not believe it has ever been taken in that way by anyone else.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh!

Mr. FREAR. Just a moment. Because the fact had been announced in the papers, and by the chairman of the committee, that they were going to take over new projects. That is all; and I have no right to comment on anything that occurred in the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. When the gentleman made that statement he knew that he could not comment upon it, but by the insinuation he gave the impression that the members of that committee were distributing $47,000,000 in a method that could not be commended. That is what he meant to say; that is the ordinary meaning of the language.

Now, if the gentleman will just wait a minute, I will show him something else that is just as bad, and I say in all seriousness that this whole report is unworthy of the gentleman from Wisconsin or of a Member of this House. He knows what language means.

Mr. FREAR. I could not possibly have commented upon it under the rule.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Of course you could not comment on it, but you could have kept still about it. You had no right to refer to it. That is where you do by insinuation what you dare not do openly.

Mr. FREAR. I dare do anything that is fair, and I will. The gentleman mistakes my disposition.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. This report has all the characteristics of some editor of some yellow newspaper or magazine who dares not make a statement, but wants to insinuate as much as he can, hoping thereby to escape a libel suit. Now, wait a minute and I will give you a little more of what he said. He says it is a matter of public knowledge that the committee distributed 60 new projects in five days, and he says further:

> It is submitted that the insertion of new projects in this manner does not permit further comment in this report, although a brief consideration of value, or lack of value, ought to be placed before the House when the bill is under discussion.

What is the truth in regard to that? He wants the House and the country to believe that this committee placed 60 new projects in that bill in five days without giving them due consideration. Is not that what his language means? If that is not what language means, then I do not know the meaning of English words.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; not just now. Now, that is the statement he made. That is what he sends out to the newspapers. That is what he sends out to get his publicity and his headlines. Now, what is the truth about it? He said there were 60 new projects. There were 81. That is about as close as he usually comes, and I commend him for getting that near to the fact in that one statement. Now, what is the fact? Of these 81 new projects 76 were included in the 1914 bill, if I am not mistaken. They had been before the committee before. They had been considered; we knew about them; they were not new projects except in a technical sense, because they had already been considered and been before the committee before; but he sends out to the people of the country and wants them to believe that the committee took those 81 new projects, or 60 as he says, and in five days, without consideration, sat around a table and by methods that he can not comment upon distributed this $47,000,000.

If he had wanted to be fair about it, why did he not say that most of these projects had been considered by the committee before; that the committee was familiar with them; that some of them had been before the committee for years? If he wanted to be fair, why did he not continue and say that a good many of those projects, perhaps the majority of them, were in reality a mere continuation of old projects? I submit to the Members of this House that if the people of this country could come here and listen to some of these reformers and know the facts about the situation, these reformers would get about as much hearing throughout the country as they do here in this House.

Let us see whether it is such a reprehensible thing to take on new projects in five days. I shall take my own projects, because they are the ones with which I am most familiar, those of the northwest portion of this country. Each one of them has been before the committee for years; but suppose they were not, how long would it take an intelligent Member to decide in respect to any one of them? For instance, take, as an illustration, the new project on the Skagit River. The Skagit River is the largest river that flows into Puget Sound. Mount Vernon is at the head of navigation. The annual commerce upon that river is about $4,000,000. Water competition directly reduces freight rates, because the railroad runs through the town, and on passenger rates it makes about a dollar a passenger between there and the city of Seattle. There is a bar between the mouth of the river and the head of navigation, Mount Vernon, and unless it is removed the whole navigation will be stopped, and the advantage of the freight rates will be lost. Four million dollars' worth of commerce will be destroyed or sent by rail. It will cost $30,000 to do that. How many men in this House would have to take a day or half an hour to decide whether that is a new project that ought to be included in the bill?

Let us take the other one, one of the largest new projects in the bill. At Seattle for the purpose of a canal the Government has expended $3,000,000. The local authorities have expended $6,000,000 more. That great project is ready to use, but in order to use it you have to dredge between the lake and the deep water in Puget Sound, or else the whole property is of no value. How long would any intelligent Member of this House want to study that matter to determine whether or not it ought to be adopted?

Most of the new projects are of that class. There are a good many projects in this bill where there can be a fair difference of opinion, where people can honestly differ, but the majority of these are not the new projects; and I want to repeat that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] made an argument that was unworthy of him and unworthy of any Member of this House when in a report which he writes, and not in an utterance upon the floor of the House, he spreads the impression throughout the country that in its grab for pork the Members of the committee sat around the table and in five days distributed these projects in a method that he could not comment upon, and failed to state that most of them had been passed upon, and that there were only a few that were new to the committee, and that most of those were of such character that he himself, if he had attended the committee meetings and had attended to his business, would have decided ought to go on the bill. [Applause.]

I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not vote for this river and harbor bill, although that decision is entirely apart from the merits of the bill. I shall not vote for it because I think that we could do without an annual river and harbor bill in the present state of the Treasury. I shall take the time, however, to make a very slight statement, which I may not have time to complete, with reference to the formation of a river and harbor bill. There have been a great many suggestions made at different times. Whatever men may think about the merits of particular propositions in a bill, there is no legislation which comes before Congress which is so critically scanned by experts as are the river and harbor bills before they reach the House. In the first place, the War Department itself can not institute any recommendation upon its own motion. It is the only branch of the Government that is not permitted to do so. The Executive can not order the War Department to make a report or an estimate or a recommendation to Congress in reference to a river and harbor improvement. You can not reach the War Department through political influence exercised upon the President or the Secretary of War. A provision in the river and harbor bill begins with an item for a survey, and under the law the engineers can not make a survey until as experts they have made an examination as to the probable economy of the improvement, the use that will be made of it, and the benefit that it will be to the shipping industry and to the public.

The Board of Engineers of the United States Army are selected men from West Point, who hold their office for life, or for good behavior if they do their work. They are the least subject to political influence of any body in the United States by reason of their position. [Applause.] They can not go to the political activities which exist in the War Department with reference to promotions, because all of their promotions are automatic except as to the Chief of Engineers. When we determine by reason of the activity of a Member of Congress representing his constituents to ask that board to make an examination, they have to first determine whether it will be a profitable adventure if entered upon, and then they are permitted to make an estimate of the cost and present the project to the House. The House itself can not order them to do this. It could at one time by a resolution. The Senate itself can not order them to do this. It is the only case in the Government service where the House can not by resolution ask Government officers to render a service, or where the Senate can not by a resolution ask Government officers to render a service. After they make their estimate, made by the local engineer aided by a civilian engineer working under him, also permanently employed, they have to go through the form—in many cases it is a form, though in some cases it is the real thing—of having the report pass through the district engineer and the engineer of the enlarged district, whose title I do not now remember. Then the matter goes before the Board of Engineers. Then it comes before the Chief of Engineers. Then it comes before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. There are more processes involved, and far more expert men, wholly disinterested, unbiased, uncontrolled by politics, in reference to a river and harbor item than any other legislation provided by any legislative assembly in the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the river and harbor bill comes to the House. We call it a pork-barrel bill. It is in the sense that term is used. It comes to the House as an omnibus bill, with the items bunched together. If we had a thousand hours in the day and a thousand days in the year and could sit here all the time, possibly, but not probably, we might consider those items by themselves. It is never practicable to pass river and harbor items as separate bills, and with some experience in the House I venture to say that if the river and harbor items were introduced as separate bills by Members from their various districts, with those Members pulling and hauling, with the personal influence upon the committee, there would be more bad projects reported by that system than are reported now, because the committee then would say, "Oh, the items come up by themselves; the responsibility is not upon us, the responsibility is upon the House." It is an easy question to cite the Claims Committee of the House, a good committee, which has done excellent work, but which reports more bad bills through personal solicitation than all the other committees of the House combined, because they are separate bills. Pulling and hauling is what gets it. If we should make a lump-sum appropriation to the War Department, it would not benefit things at all, because half the scanning will be taken away. We do not provide for river and harbor bills until they have passed the War Department. Then they have to pass the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, they have to pass the House and Senate, though I do not know that that is very much under the circumstances, and the giving of a lump sum would only make it worse. But to let the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of War, and one other Secretary, as provided in this bill, select some chief clerk there or some high-priced clerk, wholly subject to political influence, wholly under the control of a superior officer, holding a tenure of office at the will of the man above him, without training, without expertness, for them to pass upon the methods now in existence of determining these things by the War Department, would be to ask an ignorant man to judge of the literary ability of a distinguished scholar. What is the use? [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LIEB].

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the important appropriation bills which must initiate in the House of Representatives. It represents one of the most useful activities of the Federal Government. The improvement of harbors, of interior waterways, for the development of water-borne commerce, is certainly of sufficient importance to entitle it to the serious consideration of the Congress representing the country. I think it is fair to state that this river and harbor bill is no more subject to criticism than any of the other great appropriation bills which annually come before Congress. It is not perfect; of course, it is not; neither is any other of the appropriation bills perfect. It is inherent in a democracy to have many claims for Government activities upon the Federal Treasury; yet in the consideration of those claims, in a country as diversified as ours in climate, in soil, and in other necessary governmental needs, it is not to be wondered at that there will be disagreements upon the part of some as to the merit or demerit of some particular item in a river and harbor bill.

Now, I shall devote the brief time I have to some of the criticisms which have been made. Wise and honest and intelligent criticism is useful when applied to any legislation of a public character, and it is certainly useful on this bill. I think, for instance, the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], while I and others may not agree with him in its entirety, yet we can at least appreciate the honesty and zeal of his efforts, knowing the time that he has given to the consideration as a member of the committee in the formulation of this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated that he thought we ought not to have a bill at this time, and he is entitled to his opinion; and as a respected and diligent and influential Member of this House, any expression from him will be given consideration. But I submit that the kind of criticism against this bill which emanated from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is not worthy of him, is not worthy of the House, and is unfair toward his colleagues. He made the statement that at least one-half of this bill was waste, that the appropriations were for no useful purpose. That of course implies that his colleagues on the committee have either deliberately or ignorantly appropriated money for no useful purpose. Of course that is a very serious charge, but that is the only implication from such language. He is not in favor of river and harbor legislation. He would not vote for this bill no matter what kind of a bill was reported. He did the committee the honor just a moment ago to say that he admits the projects for the great harbor of New York are good, but he does not know. Now, if he does not know whether those projects for the great harbor of New York are meritorious, I would like to know how far his knowledge extends as to other projects in the country, particularly those in the interior. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman said that every statement in his minority report was correct, and he challenged the House or any Member of the House to point out any incorrect statement in that report.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SMALL. I do.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said I challenged them to point out some mistake. I assume a mistake may be made either by the gentleman or myself, but I did not want to be misunderstood.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman challenged us just to point out a mistake.

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. I will just point out a few. At the bottom of page 2 in his report it is stated that Ashland Harbor receives nothing in this bill. As a matter of fact, on page 29 of the bill there is an appropriation of $10,000 for the purpose of completing a project which was estimated for in the report submitted in House Document No. 1698, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Not now. A project which was estimated to cost $269,984. A total of $634,500 has been heretofore appropriated for Ashland Harbor. When the gentleman stated that nothing had been appropriated he would have us infer, I presume, that Ashland Harbor had been neglected.

Mr. FREAR. I wish to correct the gentleman on that point. I was referring entirely to the whole project. I was giving the comparison.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman said there was no appropriation in the bill, as appears in his minority report, bottom of page 2.

Mr. FREAR. No.

Mr. SMALL. And as to Chicago Harbor, the gentleman has combined the commerce for Chicago Harbor and Chicago River, Calumet Harbor and the Calumet River, and states that Chicago receives only $65,000 in the bill. These projects receive altogether $103,170, of which $38,170 is for widening the channel at the mouth of the Calumet River, and the balance is for maintenance. All projects are completed except that for the outer harbor at Chicago, and there is an available balance of $899,723 for continuing this work, which the Chief of Engineers says is sufficient for all work contemplated prior to July 1, 1918. The only purpose of the reference to Chicago Harbor was to show that it had been neglected. Why did not the gentleman disclose these facts?

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield there? That was not the purpose at all.

Mr. SMALL. Then his language can have no purpose whatever. The gentleman says that Buffalo Harbor gets nothing in the bill. As a matter of fact, it appears from the report of the Chief of Engineers that there was a balance on hand June 30 last of $237,306, with which it is intended to repair breakwaters and do maintenance work, and the Chief of Engineers says that is sufficient for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918. If the gentleman's purpose was to show that harbor had been neglected, why did he not say so?

Mr. FREAR. That was not my purpose and the gentleman knows it was not.

Mr. SMALL. What was the purpose?

Mr. FREAR. I wish to show that the amount of money, $18,000,000, given other projects was not equalled——

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman may deceive himself but not honest men.

Mr. FREAR. I do not deceive myself.

Mr. SMALL. I decline to yield further. The gentleman says in his report that Cleveland Harbor only gets $60,000. There was a balance of $298,770 on hand on June 30 last, which with the $60,000 allowed in this bill will do all the maintenance work and repair work for the next fiscal year. He says the Duluth-Superior Harbor is allowed only $45,000. As a matter of fact, the bill carries $69,000 for this harbor, and an estimate of $180,000 will go in the sundry civil bill under a continuing contract heretofore authorized. Why did not the gentleman tell the truth?

Speaking of the Oklawaha River, he says it had only 1,760 tons of commerce in 1915. The statistics in the report of 1916, page 2302, include the following:

Oranges, crate material, grain and hay, naval stores, cypress logs, pine logs, and miscellaneous, making a total of 29,393 tons.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield? That is absolutely correct——

Mr. SMALL. Not unless the gentleman says my statement is incorrect.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman's statement is incorrect if he will take out the saw logs.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman made the statement in his report that there was only 1,760 tons of commerce.

Mr. FREAR. I know the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SMALL. Another statement in the gentleman's report is on page 4, referring to the Brazos River. He states that it has received $2,946,250 for a small commerce near the mouth of the river and carries $66,000 for the old project, and $150,000 more for another project, which, when adopted, will mean $455,000.

As a matter of fact, the project adopted includes only 6½ miles above the mouth of the river, and is separate and distinct from the open channel and lock and dam project, extending 417½ miles above the mouth of the river, which presumably the gentleman referred to. Why did he not tell all the truth about it?

On page 4, as to the upper Cumberland, he says that in 1915 it only produced 37,000 tons of "commerce," excluding sand hauled 9 miles, and timber products. I have here a statement from the annual report of the Chief of Engineers, showing that in the calendar year 1915 there were on that river 266,639 tons of commerce. The total freight, exclusive of sand and gravel and rafted products, is given as 96,355 tons, valued at $3,878,618. Why did the gentleman state it was 37,000 tons? Why did not the gentleman tell all the truth?

Mr. FREAR. Does the gentleman say these figures are not correct? I will put then in the RECORD, then, to show the duplication.

Mr. SMALL. I decline to yield.

In his minority report, on page 4, speaking of the Cumberland River, he says:

On this same river, the Cumberland below Nashville, the Government has further appropriated in past years $3,184,267, in addition to $632,000 more contained in the pending bill, to produce in 1915 just 16,374 tons of commerce, excluding timber products and sand and gravel.

What are the facts? I have before me here a table, which I clipped from the annual report of the Chief of Engineers, giving an itemized statement of the commerce of that section of the Cumberland River for the calendar year 1915, which shows a total commerce of 126,949 tons. The total commerce, exclusive of sand and gravel and rafted products, is given at 109,079 tons, and not 16,374 tons as given in the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. But did not the gentleman deliberately misrepresent me there?

Mr. SMALL. I decline to yield. Why did not the gentleman tell all the truth?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman misquoted me, that is all, and refuses to allow me to correct it.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman; I selected a few statements in the minority report of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I have shown by the official record that they are incorrect.

As the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] well said, it will be difficult to find a report which is more disjointed, where facts are stated with less regard to reasoning sequence, which is more difficult to analyze, which has more glaring misstatements of facts, and which is unworthy of a report submitted to this House in opposition to a great appropriation bill than this minority report submitted by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Legitimate criticism, as gentlemen before have said, is invited. The House wishes it. The members of this committee wish it. But the kind of criticism which only seeks publicity, which goes outside of the House in order to disparage, to malign, and to slander the good name and the reputation of the colleagues of a Member upon the committee and his colleagues in this House is unworthy of a Member of the House. [Applause.]

Let us hope that such criticism as this, sooner or later, will be taken at its true worth. The gentleman will learn that not for the sake of mere publicity, not for the sake of disparaging the reputation of the membership of this House, of which he is one, can he oppose legislation in this House, whether it be alleged "pork-barrel" bills, or any other appropriation bills, or any other class of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, legitimate criticism of this bill at the hands of an industrious and intelligent Member might point out items which were worthy of the consideration of this body. I can not say whether or not the gentleman has been intelligent or diligent in the discharge of his duties as a member of the committee. That would be in violation of the rules. But I would challenge the gentleman—which I think would not be a violation of the rules—at some time during the consideration of this bill to get up and tell the House truthfully and frankly, if he can do so—and I assume that he can—exactly how he did discharge his duties as a member of this important committee.

Mr. FREAR. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. SMALL. And if he makes the statement frankly and truthfully, as I assume he will do, and his statement is corroborated by his colleagues on the committee, then he must take the chances of the correct inference as to the manner in which he has discharged his duties before the House and the country and as to whether he is entitled to credence in the press of the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wills Strait, Casco Bay, Me.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1416, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $16,500.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire during the reading of the bill at different points to strike out some of the items and also to read other items. I do not care particularly to speak of this item, but I want to say a word in response to what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] has said, the gentleman who has just spoken. It places me in the position of being compelled to make a statement of what took place in the committee. I have not that right, as the gentleman well knows. I would be very glad to give all my reasons to the gentleman, and I will say that from 8 or half past 8 o'clock in the morning until nearly 6 o'clock at night I have been working every day in my office on this bill and others as best I could.

The gentleman has quoted some figures in the minority report unfairly, for when I stated "timber products" and he said "rafted products" of course he must have known that he was not quoting me correctly. I say there may be errors in this report, but the gentleman has not pointed them out in any instance. I did not state that this report is accurate in every particular, but I do say the gentleman has not pointed out a single statement where an error has been made.

If the House permits, I shall be glad to state what happened in the committee. Have I that right, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that a Member has not that right.

Mr. FREAR. I assume so, and I do not want to be discourteous to the House in justification of my own course, Mr. Chairman. I was patient, and I endeavored to be consistent and fair and honest with every member of the committee. I think the chairman will concede that I attended many of the meetings of the committee, and that I wrote him frankly my position on this bill right from the start, right after the bill was made up. The chairman knows that. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], for whom I have a very high opinion——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me for an interruption?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose a gentleman has the right to ask a question. Was the gentleman from Wisconsin present at the meetings of the committee when the bill was made up?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes; at different meetings, as frequently as I found opportunity.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Did the gentleman attend the meetings of the committee regularly after the 1st of January, when they were considering the new projects?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, have I the right to answer that?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can state whether he attended the meetings or not.

Mr. FREAR. I notified the chairman of the committee at that time that I was opposed to the bill, and that not one or two or three items could persuade me to vote for the bill, because my item was in. That is the situation I found myself in.

Mr. HULBERT. Does the gentleman believe that because he was opposed to the bill because he could not understand it before it was made up, that that discharged him from performing the duty of attending the meetings of the committee and keeping out items that he did not believe ought to be therein?

Mr. FREAR. The old projects had practically been agreed upon. There is no question about that. And when it came to the new projects, I was opposed to adding them to the bill. Others members who were opposed to them also refused to attend the meetings of the committee. There was nothing to be gained thereby. I could not change the result, so I began to prepare my report and for discussion of this and other bills which were expected to come up immediately for passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nantucket Harbor, Mass.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $45,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment under the last item will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not ask to strike out many of the items. I wish to present some facts, and it is with this fact in mind at this time, with a large deficit in the Treasury, I submit that we are making a very large appropriation for a very small harbor, comparatively. Last year there was nothing, practically, expended. There was $169 expended last year. We have on hand for that project a balance of $17,000. Forty-five thousand dollars is proposed now for a project that is a mile and a quarter in length. The channel is 300 feet wide and 15 feet deep. It has only a nominal commerce, and it has no effect on freight rates.

My point is this: I do not move to strike out the paragraph, but it seems to me to be far better to allow a proposition of that kind to go over, or make a modest appropriation, than to make an appropriation of $45,000 in view of the fact that we expended only $169 last year.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma motion to strike out, for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the necessary repairs are occasioned by storm and conditions of ice.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pawtucket River, R. I.: Completing improvement in accordance with report submitted in House Document No. 1283, Sixty-fourth, Congress, first session, $61,440.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, by striking out lines 9, 10, 11, and 12.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I assume that this bill is to carry only the very important new projects that are to be considered. For that reason, from a reading of the Engineer's report, which I have read very carefully, and from the examination that has been made, it does not seem to me that this is a project that really needs to be acted upon at this time. Already there have been $507,000 spent upon this river. The channel is 15 to 18 feet deep and has been completed for its length, 3 or 4 miles. The report says that, so far as known, the existing project has had no effect on freight rates. The expenditures in 1916 were $16.67. This new project is to widen a channel for towing barges at a cost of $61,440.

On page 2 the report says:

Owing to the amount of rock in the upper part of the channel the district officer states that it is not practicable to provide increased depth at a reasonable cost, and he believes that the present project depth of 16 feet should be retained.

So it is not to dig a deeper channel, but to widen it. Reading from page 3:

The principal traffic is in coal handled by barges in tow. Dealers in this commodity have desired a deeper channel in order to accommodate barges requiring a depth of about 18 feet, but it appears that any deepening would necessitate considerable excavation in ledge rock at excessive cost. As practically all the heavy tonnage is in vessels handled in tows, the present channel width of 100 feet is considered inadequate, and the district officer recommends that it be increased to 150 feet at an estimated cost of $61,440.

The Army engineers report against any deepening. There is not a regular boat line, I take it from reading the report. Turning to page 8, appears the possibility of organizing a boat line, where the report says in a clipping from a newspaper:

The feasibility of establishing steamboat service between New York and this city was considered at length yesterday at a regular meeting of the State harbor improvement commissioners at headquarters in the statehouse. No action was taken, and the question will be discussed again later.

For all these reasons it does not appear to me to be a very important project to carry on at this time. It may be eventually but does not seem to be necessary now, and that is the reason I move to strike it out.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to strike out the item contained in this bill for the further improvement of Pawtucket River, R. I. This Pawtucket River project extends partly through a portion of the district I have the honor to represent in this House and partly through a portion of the district represented by my colleague on the other side of this Chamber. The report of the Army engineers who have surveyed this project contains a strong recommendation of the same, and upon it I think the House is altogether justified in retaining this appropriation in the bill.

On page 3 of the Report of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, dated June 20, 1916, I find the following paragraph:

> It will be seen that the commerce on this river is large both in tonnage and in value. The greater part of it is handled in tows, and difficulty is experienced in keeping in the narrow channel, particularly when passing other tows. Some increase in width is considered essential to safety and convenience, and it appears that this can be secured at a reasonable cost. While greater depth would be of some advantage, it is not attainable within limits of justifiable cost on account of the ledge rock bottom. In view of the foregoing the board concurs with the district officer in the opinion that it is advisable to modify the existing project by increasing the width of the channel from 100 feet to 150 feet at an estimated cost of $61,440, which amount should be made available in one appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, the statement just made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] respecting the total amount expended upon all projects connected with this river is true. The river has been under improvement since 1867. But the gentleman failed to tell you that the State of Rhode Island has contributed with some degree of liberality toward the improvement of this river. The river and harbor act of March 3, 1907, laid down the condition that in the prosecution of the work the State of Rhode Island should contribute $67,792 toward the cost of the improvement. The State complied with this condition. Besides this, Mr. Chairman, the State of Rhode Island since 1911 has expended the sum of $74,595.43 in the acquisition of land and the building of a quay wall in the upper part of the river at Pawtucket, in order to provide better terminal facilities and easier outlets for commerce.

The test to be applied in the determination of questions such as this should be the amount and value of the commerce carried upon the river. Applying this test to this particular project the tonnage figures indicate that this river is a considerable artery of commerce. During the past three years approximately 540,000 tons, valued at $6,600,000, constitute the average of this river's carriage on 9,627 vessels, of which 4,802 were registered vessels of considerable size. The traffic on the river consists of coal barges and schooners carrying lumber and building material. Two steamers run regularly between Phillipsdale and New York, carrying iron and copper.

The part borne by the State of Rhode Island in the improvement of this river and in furnishing facilities for commerce thereon shows the interest which that State has taken in river and harbor development. It does not and never has depended entirely upon the National Treasury in the matter of river and harbor improvement. On the contrary, it has always manifested a spirit of cooperation with the National Government by making equitable State contributions toward its own river and harbor improvements. This willingness on the part of the State to contribute is the best evidence of the necessity and importance of the contemplated improvement.

The length of the improved portion of the Pawtucket River, including that portion which is called the Seekonk, lower down, between Red Bridge at Providence and Division Street Bridge at Pawtucket, is about 3½ miles. The act of March 3, 1905, provided for a channel above the Red Bridge at Providence 16 feet deep at mean low water and 100 feet wide, the width being reduced to 50 feet through the ledge rock at Pawtucket. The act of March 3, 1909, authorized the expenditure of any balance after the completion of the above work in deepening the channel to 18 feet and increasing the width at such places as would best subserve the interests of commerce. The 16-foot project has been completed, the channel has been widened somewhat lower down the river near Phillipsdale, and an increased depth in the channel has been made through the ledge rock at the upper end of the river at Pawtucket. Commerce, however, is still hampered at the upper end of the improvement and will continue to remain so unless the channel through the ledge rock at Pawtucket is made considerably wider. It is earnestly hoped that the Army engineers will recognize the commercial necessities of such an increase and report favorably thereon at an early date in accordance with the survey authorized and directed under the terms of the present bill.

Mr. Chairman, the population of Rhode Island is given up almost entirely to manufacturing and industrial pursuits. The products of that State's 2,200 or more manufacturing concerns, employing about 125,000 wage earners, are well known the world over, consisting as they do of about every article of manufacture that makes for the comfort and convenience of mankind. But for raw materials and foodstuffs Rhode Island is dependent upon the products of other States. We exchange the products of our factories for the things which we can not produce ourselves. Any plan or project which will bring us into closer commercial and fraternal relations with other States deserves to be commended and indorsed. The city of Pawtucket, located at the headwaters of the Pawtucket River, about 4 miles up from Narragansett Bay, has no access by water to the great centers of population which lie to the south except through the channel which the appropriation contained in this bill proposes to widen. The merchants of that city are anxiously awaiting this river improvement which they believe will afford cheaper rates of transportation and give to northern Rhode Island and the territory surrounding increased and more adequate commercial facilities.

Mr. Chairman, this paragraph relative to the appropriation for the Pawtucket River is altogether justifiable. It should remain in the bill, and the motion, therefore, of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] should be promptly defeated.

Mr. Chairman, this river for which this appropriation was recommended rises in the vicinity of Worcester, Mass., and flows about 50 miles, emptying into Providence Harbor at Providence, R. I., the headwaters of Narragansett Bay. From its source to the falls at Pawtucket it is known as the Blackstone River, named after William Blackstone, the first settler of Boston, who afterwards settled on its banks. From Worcester, Mass., this river falls 450 feet to salt water at Pawtucket, and in its general southeasterly course it has for a number of years turned more mill wheels than any other river of similar size in the country.

Navigation above the falls at Pawtucket was formerly carried on through a canal, known as the Blackstone Canal, which entered Providence Harbor and connected the city of Worcester with the city of Providence. This canal, which has long since been abandoned, pursued a northerly course, entering the valley of the Pawtucket River and following the river valley to Worcester. It was 45 miles long, 4 feet deep, 34 feet wide at the top and 18 feet wide at the bottom. It contained 48 locks, 80 by 10 feet. It was completed in 1828 at a cost of $750,000. The opening of this canal first engaged public attention in 1796.

The plan of opening this waterway from Narragansett Bay, in Rhode Island, into the heart of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts was conceived by John Brown, one of the early inhabitants of Providence. A charter was obtained in Rhode Island, but the petition of inhabitants of Worcester County, Mass., praying for incorporation for the opening of this enterprise was refused by the General Court of the Commonwealth, whereupon the undertaking was abandoned. In 1822, however, the plan was revived and subscriptions opened for a survey. Meetings were held both in Providence and Worcester at which the subject was discussed and a unanimous sentiment expressed that canal navigation in the valley of the Blackstone should be opened with all possible expedition. Committees were appointed to further investigate the subject. With the funds subscribed by individuals, they engaged Benjamin Wright, Esq., chief engineer upon the middle section of the great Erie Canal, to make a topographical survey of the route; to examine the character of the soil; to ascertain whether the supplies of water were sufficient; to estimate the expense of construction; and to report thereon. The survey was commenced, the levels taken, and the whole completed by Mr. Wright, assisted by two engineers, in September, 1822. Mr. Wright concluded his report, submitted October 2, 1822, by expressing the hope of seeing this important improvement accomplished for the benefit of New England. Acts of incorporation were obtained for distinct companies in Massachusetts and Rhode Island. The companies united July 5, 1825, under the name of the Blackstone Canal Company. The excavation was begun in Rhode Island in 1824 and the first earth was removed in Massachusetts in 1826. The enterprise was completed in 1828, and on October 7 of that year the first boat, Lady Carrington, passed through the Blackstone Canal. For more than a decade navigation proceeded, 12 freight boats and 1 passenger boat plying up and down the new waterway. In the early forties, however, disputes arose concerning water power in the mill privileges along the Blackstone, which impeded navigation and finally operated to discontinue the canal.

Between the city of Pawtucket and Providence Harbor flows that portion of the river which is known as the Pawtucket and the Seekonk. The Seekonk is of the tidal type, and through it navigation is carried on up to the city of Pawtucket. The Seekonk is the river made famous by Roger Williams, who, after his banishment from Massachusetts, with five companions embarked in a canoe and paddled across its waters in 1636. On the opposite shore, so the story goes, they paused in their journey to receive the salutations of a group of Indians, who greeted them with the cry, "What cheer, Netop," which some historians translate "What good news, friend?" and others "How are you, friend?" The spot where he landed tradition calls Slate Rock; but concerning what was said and done at that first meeting there are no records extant. Reembarking, Williams and his companions, history tells us, paddled down the Seekonk River to its mouth, and, turning to the right around the promontory, they entered an estuary of Narragansett Bay. Proceeding northward, they reached the spot where the waters of the Woonasquatucket commingled with those of the Moshassuck River. Here at the foot of the hill at the fringe of the primeval forest they disembarked and discovered a spring of sparkling water. This place was to be their home. Here were laid the foundations of a great city, which Williams named Providence, a city whose corporate seal bears the legend, "What cheer"—the salutation received by the first settler and his companions from the Indians who greeted them as they paddled their journey across the Seekonk.

Mr. Chairman, this river which bears the triple name of the Blackstone, the Pawtucket, and the Seekonk has played an important part in the history and development of the sections through which it passes, and the crossing of its lower waters by one of the early apostles of liberty marked an epoch in the twilight hours of American history. But it is with the future commercial possibilities of this river from Pawtucket down to the broad expanse of waters in Narragansett Bay that we are especially concerned in this appropriation. The city of Pawtucket is a great industrial center. North of Pawtucket along the valley of the Blackstone is a network of industrial and manufacturing centers that will be commercially benefited by improvement in navigation upon this river. In this valley there is a population of 150,000 people, and the number is constantly increasing. In the 10 years from 1905 to 1915 the measure of increase was in the neighborhood of 20 per cent. The value of the products in the various establishments of this section is over $100,000,000. It is a self-evident proposition that as population is multiplied and industrial output increased both in amount and value, and such will hereafter be the case in this progressive center, all the available highways of commerce must be opened, improved, and maintained; otherwise industrial progress must necessarily be checked and the chances of commercial development greatly retarded in the future.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I base my opposition very largely on the engineer's report as applied to the existing project. On page 127 of the engineer's report we find, as stated by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. KENNEDY], that one of the conditions of the modification of the act of 1907 was that the State of Rhode Island should itself contribute $67,792, and this condition was complied with, showing cooperation of the local community. That is one of the factors that that Committee on Rivers and Harbors is invariably trying to have carried out, local cooperation, either by the State, the municipality, or other form of local unit. It seems to me that this cooperation having been carried out by the State shows the interest in the locality in the project itself. It is stated that the channel is a narrow one. The improvement as contemplated by the project we are adopting in this bill will increase the usefulness of the channel reaching to Pawtucket. Then we have the schedule of freight. The traffic to Pawtucket is in barges, and its value is very large. In 1915 it amounted to $5,677,875. It seems to me that the item is meritorious and should remain in the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will, in that connection, call attention to the report of Col. Abbot, which will be found in House Document 1283, recommending this project, and the last paragraph of which reads as follows:

It will be seen that the commerce on this river is large both in tonnage and in value. The greater part of it is handled in tows and difficulty is experienced in keeping in the narrow channel, particularly when passing other tows. Some increase in width is considered essential to safety and convenience, and it appears that this can be secured at reasonable cost. While greater depth would be of some advantage, it is not attainable within limits of justifiable cost on account of the ledge rock bottom. In view of the foregoing, the board concurs with the district officer in the opinion that it is advisable to modify the existing project by increasing the width of the channel from 100 feet to 150 feet at an estimated cost of $61,440, which amount should be made available in one appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Norwalk Harbor, Conn.: For maintenance, $8,000; for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1143, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $50,000; in all, $58,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of that part of the paragraph after the figures "$8,000," in line 20, page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 20, by striking out all of the paragraph after the figures "$8,000" in line 20.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is another of the new projects relating to Norwalk. On page 13 of House Document No. 143—

16. In view of the considerations detailed I am of the opinion that Norwalk Harbor, Conn., is worthy of further improvement to the extent of providing—

A main channel 12 feet deep from the 12-foot curve in the Sheffield Island Harbor to the highway bridge at South Norwalk, 200 feet wide to Dorlons Point, thence 150 feet wide to South Norwalk, and 250 feet wide along the wharf frontage of South Norwalk.

An anchorage basin 10 feet deep and about 17 acres in area in the upper harbor.

A channel 10 feet deep and generally 150 feet wide, with increased width at the turns, from South Norwalk to the head of navigation in the Norwalk River.

The maintenance of the existing channel 6 feet deep and 75 feet wide along the east side of the harbor to the head of navigation at East Norwalk.

The estimated cost of the improvement is $218,000 for the initial improvement, $8,000 annually for the first three years, and $4,000 annually thereafter for maintenance.

17. The proposed outer channel is regarded as suitable for the navigation of vessels of a maximum draft of 10 feet at all usual tides, 11½ feet at mean low water, and 18 feet at mean high water; the channel above South Norwalk for vessels of a maximum draft of 9½ feet at mean low water and 16 feet at mean high water; the channel to East Norwalk for vessels of 12 feet draft at mean high water, for which vessels, respectively, these channels are designed.

18. Should the project be adopted by Congress, the work should be prosecuted in the interests of economy at a rate sufficient to secure its completion in three years. To this end an initial appropriation of $88,000 is necessary, followed by two appropriations of $65,000 each.

G. B. PILLSBURY,
Major, Corps of Engineers.

I propose to show later with reference to this and other items that there is a disposition to put on the initial project enough to fasten it on Congress so that hereafter we will make the additional appropriation. Here an initial appropriation of $8,000 is to be made. We have spent $207,000 on the harbor. Nine thousand one hundred and fifty dollars is the balance on hand, and that $9,150 balance is to be used as follows: Eight thousand dollars for maintenance; administration, $1,150; and of the new amount of $8,000 the engineer says $7,000 is for maintenance, and $1,000 is for administration.

Now, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what this administration is for, taking, as it does, usually about 15 per cent and sometimes as high as 33 per cent of the appropriation. What does it go for and what is the immediate necessity for it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have a statement here, as I anticipated some question of this kind might come up, so I asked the Chief of Engineers to make a statement, and I will submit it to the gentleman. He gives the different purposes for which the expenditures are made.

He says:

In the office of the Chief of Engineers, expenses for the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, including the pay of the resident member of the board.

Services of technical and other assistants aside from statutory positions.

Telegrams and long-distance telephone service on river and harbor matters.

Express and freight charges.

Mileage of officers and assistants traveling on river and harbor duty.

That, I think, answers the questions of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. Does the chairman think that 15 per cent is a proper amount for that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, I can not say as to that.

Mr. FREAR. Does the gentleman think from 15 to 30 per cent——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, it frequently is not as high as that. When it is 15 per cent it is apt to be caused by the fact that the appropriations were very small. In the larger appropriations it amounts to less than 10 per cent.

Mr. FREAR. I will read one or two other extracts from this report:

10. The wharves contiguous to this waterway are located at Norwalk, South Norwalk, and East Norwalk and are the usual pile or crib structures used for that purpose. A short distance above South Norwalk there are located the wharves which served the Danbury & Norwalk Railroad when this line had its terminus at the port. These docks still have rail connections, but are not in their present condition available for use. A public wharf is regarded as desirable, both at Norwalk and South Norwalk, at such points on the water front convenient to the highways as could be most advantageously secured by the local authorities.

In other words, there seems to be no terminal facilities there whatever, and it seems that this is to be provided for after the appropriation is made. If we appropriate anything, we ought to appropriate the full amount asked for by the engineers.

Now, I am unable to reply to some arguments that have been made. Under the rule I can not reply. I moved to strike this out because it does not seem to be of pressing necessity.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. I would like to inquire whether or not it is a fact that when these items were under consideration the assistant to the Chief of the Army Engineers was not present at the meeting, and members of the committee who attended had full opportunity to interrogate him in regard to the projects, and particularly with respect to items concerning which the gentleman from Wisconsin makes inquiry?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman is correct. As I recall, Col. Newcomer, from the Office of the Chief of Engineers, was before the committee during the entire time we were considering the new projects in this bill.

Mr. FREAR. Would the chairman believe the testimony of this gentleman as superior to the engineer or the Chief of Engineers, the engineer who was upon the particular project, and the engineer who approved it—which testimony would he prefer?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not care to show any distinction. Both are worthy of belief. Besides, I am willing to stand upon the report, and I fancy every other gentleman here is willing to do the same, whether he votes for or against the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. FREAR. This report calls for $88,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Greenwich Harbor, Conn.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 289, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $35,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 4, by striking out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, we have appropriated about $27,000 already, and this project calls for $35,000 more. On page 3 of the report, House Document 289, Sixty-third Congress, first session, we find a statement that the total commerce is 96,000 tons, of which sand and so on and lumber are the principal features, and that practically only 7,500 tons of merchandise was carried last year. We find the statement that a regular freight steamer plies between Greenwich and New York and handles about 25,000 tons, the balance being carried in barges and schooners. On page 5 of the report we find the following respecting terminal facilities:

The terminal facilities of the harbor are thought to be adequate for the present and prospective commerce. There are two wharves owned by the town, but neither is so situated as to be of benefit to commerce at the present time. There are two private wharves to which the public have access on equal terms on payment of wharfage, and wharves connected with the establishments of dealers in coal, lumber, and building materials, the use of which by outside parties is sometimes granted as an accommodation. None of these wharves have rail connections, and the wharves for the general use of the public are not provided with handling facilities.

I again urge, Mr. Chairman, that there is nothing contained here which shows an immediate necessity for this project. They have no terminal facilities to supply the needs of the people there and it should not be allowed to stand.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Connecticut River, Conn.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance below Hartford, $70,100.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert a new paragraph, after line 7, on page 4, as follows:
"Connecticut River, above Hartford, Conn., to Holyoke, Mass.: For improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 417, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $520,000."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, this is a new project and one which in my estimation is as worthy as any of those which have been included in the bill by the committee. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has visited the Connecticut River and it is not necessary for me to take the time either of the House or of the committee in explaining the merits of this project. It is fully covered in House Document No. 417, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and the amendment which I have offered is in accordance with that recommendation, as described by the report of the Chief of Engineers, Gen. Kingman.

The Connecticut River is a project that has been before Congress for a good many years, and it is the one project which has been used as an example of the value and of the necessity of cooperation between the Federal Government and private corporations developing hydroelectric power. We have upon that stream going to waste day in and day out an estimated horsepower of about 35,000, and in addition to that we not alone lose the hydroelectric development, but the opportunity for commerce and the reduction of freight rates. That whole subject is thoroughly covered in the report which I hold in my hand.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. My time is very brief. If it is a brief question I will be glad to yield to the gentleman, but I desire to conclude my statement before my five minutes have expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Go on, and I will get the gentleman more time. I want to have the project explained.

Mr. TREADWAY. There are many projects, as I have said, where there should be cooperation between the hydroelectric companies and the Federal Government, and that is exactly what this report covers. Gen. Kingman's report says that unless such a contract is entered into by the Government and the local corporations in a reasonable length of time, then the Government should undertake this entire project. I maintain that the reasonable length of time has expired, and I am, therefore, urging the adoption of the project at this time. Unfortunately, in spite of its merits the committee is not in favor of it, because the so-called Adamson-Shields bill trouble continues to exist.

In that connection I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that a conference was agreed upon between the two branches of Congress on July 21, 1916, on the water-power bill, as appears in our calendar, and I am reliably informed that that conference has never as yet so much as met. It seems to me gross neglect on somebody's part that such a conference as that, having to do with as important a subject as this, has never so much as tried to reach an agreement as to the form of bill to report to the two branches. I am a rock-ribbed Republican, but I do commend our President for the effort I see by the public press he has made within the last few days to prod up that conference committee. They need it. At any rate, we need the opportunity to develop the Connecticut River, both for its hydroelectric opportunities and likewise for its commercial necessity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given two minutes more in order that I may ask him some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What depth of water do you expect to get at the upper part of this improvement?

Mr. TREADWAY. The report calls for 12 feet at Holyoke.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But there is only 12 feet at Hartford.

Mr. TREADWAY. We expect to get the same; and if the gentleman will take the pains to read the report he will find it very easy to get it. The bargain is that the Government shall expend $1,870,000 and that outside parties shall double that amount. As we were speaking about being traders, it seems to me to be a good bargain to enter into.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With that statement I am heartily in favor, and I wish it could be applied to all the items in this bill, but continuing further. The gentleman says it is easy to get 12 feet at the upper end of this improvement. I understand it is extremely difficult to maintain 12 feet at Hartford.

Mr. TREADWAY. No, sir; there is a tidewater depth at Hartford of 12 feet. The project I have referred to is the building of a lock and dam to be donated to the Government. The Government is not going to pay for it, but people are anxious to build it, if they can get any kind of terms on which to make a trade with the Government.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the report say it requires continual dredging to maintain the 12 feet?

Mr. TREADWAY. This has nothing to do with the project below Hartford. That project is from Hartford to the sea, but this is a project from Hartford up the river to Holyoke.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was speaking of the project of improvement below Hartford, which I understand requires constant dredging to maintain 12 feet of water.

Mr. TREADWAY. Below Hartford the existing project has an appropriation of——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will not say that I am opposed to this proposition, but I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman, who has himself very frankly given the reason why his amendment should not be adopted, and that is mainly because, I may say it is entirely because, the Adamson-Shields bill, or some similar measure, has not yet become a law. Until that is done it is the policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, as I think it has been that of the House itself, not to adopt projects involving the development of water power. Until Congress has laid down some rule defining the exact relation that the Government and corporations or individuals desiring to use such power sustain to each other and the terms upon which the power is to be used, I think it unwise to take on any of these improvements or any project involving the development of water power. A similar question has been presented regarding the Muscle Shoals improvement, as will be remembered by most of the Members here, as the proposition has been discussed several times on this floor, and Congress has not as yet, for the same reason, found itself in a position to adopt that project, a worthy one though it is.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TREADWAY. I just wanted to ask a question before he left the question of the Connecticut River, and that is the gentleman said, so far as he knows, that the reason it had not been adopted was this lack of amendment to the Adamson general dam act.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I believe I did put it that strongly; perhaps I ought not to have done that at this time; but I will say, nevertheless, that if this Adamson-Shields bill, or some similar bill, were the law I think the project covered by the gentleman's amendment would commend itself to the favorable consideration of this House.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman one other question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman may.

Mr. TREADWAY. I infer, then, from the remarks of the chairman of the committee that he considers the project of itself, as described in the report, meritorious?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I so consider it; but I think it unwise under the circumstances to adopt it or any similar project at this time, hence I am opposed to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

NARROWS OF LAKE CHAMPLAIN, N. Y. AND VT.

Narrows of Lake Champlain, N. Y. and Vt.: For maintenance, $5,000; for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1387, Sixty-second Congress, third session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $300; in all, $305,000.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of placing the data covering the New York items in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, the items and data are as follows:

The Narrows of Lake Champlain is that portion of the lake at its southern end, 37 miles long, located between Whitehall and Crown Point, N. Y. The portion under improvement is that extending from Whitehall, N. Y., at the southern extremity of the lake, northerly to Benson Landing, Vt., a distance of 15 miles. Burlington Harbor, Vt., is 80 miles by water north of Whitehall, and New York City is 214 miles south by water via the Champlain Canal and the Hudson River.

This waterway is a link in the great international waterway between Montreal and New York, which was formerly the controlling factor in fixing freight rates in this locality. Its influence is still strong, though it has declined recently, owing to the deterioration of the Champlain Canal, but is expected to be revived on the approaching completion of the New York State barge canal system, with its facilities for larger and more modern boats.

The commerce is carried by fleets of canal boats of about 5 feet draft towed by tugs of a maximum draft of about 12 feet. As obtained from transportation companies and reports of clearances on the Champlain Canal, the tonnage and value of this commerce are as follows:

Comparative statement.

Year.	Short tons.	Value.
1913	424,933	$4,675,311
1914	466,700	4,448,438
1915	427,791	5,425,524

NARROWS OF LAKE CHAMPLAIN, N. Y. AND VT.—NEW PROJECT.

Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document 1387, Sixty-second Congress, third session:

The present project for the improvement of the Narrows of Lake Champlain, adopted in 1899, provides for the widening of the channel and restoration of the depth to 12 feet at low water, and the placing of fenders at certain points to protect barges from collision with the rocky banks of the channel. This project was completed in 1905, and subsequent expenditures have been applied to maintenance. To adapt this channel to the boats which will use it upon completion of the enlarged Champlain Canal and communicating waterways the district officer submits, with favorable recommendation, a project providing for a channel 12 feet deep and 200 feet wide, except at one point through rock, where the width is reduced to 150 feet. The estimated cost of this plan, including the placing of new fender booms, is $737,000, and $5,000 annually for maintenance.

These reports have been referred, as required by law, to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and attention is invited to the board's report of February 6, 1913, concurring generally with the views of the district officer. The board is not satisfied that the cut-offs at Maple Bend and Chilton Bend may not be omitted without serious inconvenience to navigation and with a very material reduction in cost. If the improvement be adopted by Congress, further study of this part of the channel should be made before the work is undertaken.

The Clerk read as follows:

PORT HENRY HARBOR, N. Y.—NEW PROJECT.

Port Henry Harbor, N. Y.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 369, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $71,500.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to insert Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 369, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session:

Port Henry is located on the southwest shore of Lake Champlain, 2 miles northwest of Crown Point. It is the distributing point of the Port Henry iron-ore district, the principal mines being at Mineville, about 6 miles back from the lake shore and connected with Port Henry by rail. The annual shipments of ore during the past three years have averaged about 800,000 tons, and the receipts, chiefly coal and merchandise, have averaged from 125,000 to 170,000 tons. Only about 5 per cent of this commerce is now handled by water on account of the small depth of Lake Champlain Canal, but the enlargement of this canal to a depth of 12 feet is approaching completion. To assist in the development of the port the State of New York has adopted a project for the construction of a modern terminal at considerable cost. The present depth of water along the wharves is from 5 to 6 feet at low lake level, gradually increasing to the eastward. The district officer, who is also the division engineer, believes that the harbor should be given a depth sufficient to permit its use by boats of the maximum dimensions which the canals admit. He submits a project providing ultimately for the dredging of a strip 1,000 feet wide, covering an area of about 50 acres, to a depth of 12 feet at low lake level, and protecting this area by a breakwater, at a total estimated cost of $385,500. Pending the development of a commensurate commerce, however, he proposes to limit the improvement to the dredging of a strip 500 feet wide, covering an area of about 40 acres, at a total estimated cost of $81,500, of which local interests offer to pay $10,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

OGDENSBURG HARBOR, N. Y.—NEW PROJECT.

Ogdensburg Harbor, N. Y.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 663, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, $54,000.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to insert Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 663, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session:

The present project for improvement of this harbor, adopted by the river and harbor act approved June 25, 1910, and completed in 1913, provides for deepening the several channels of the harbor to 19 feet at low water and for removing wholly the middle ground between the two lower entrance channels, at an estimated cost of $187,970. Under this and prior projects the United States has provided an upper entrance channel, a lower entrance channel and basin, and a channel about 1 mile in length along the city front wharves connecting the two entrances, all to a depth of 19 feet below low water on the Ogdensburg gauge. The upper entrance channel has a width of from 300 to 450 feet, the narrowest part being at its inner end, where it joins the channel along the city front. The district officer states that there is difficulty in navigating around the bend at the junction of these channels, and there is also some difficulty at times in navigating the portion of the city front channel to the west of Caroline Street, where it abruptly decreases in width from 350 to 200 feet. The necessary relief would be afforded by widening this part of the channel to 350 feet, easing the bend at the junction and widening the inner end of the upper entrance channel to 400 feet. The district officer estimates the cost of this work at $54,000. He believes that the expenditure involved is justified by the commercial importance of the harbor, which has a traffic of about 1,000,000 tons a year, and in this opinion the division engineer concurs.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK HARBOR: AMBROSE, MAIN SHIP, BAYSIDE, AND GEDNEY CHANNELS.

New York Harbor, N. Y.: For maintenance, including Ambrose Channel, $40,000; for improvement of the upper bay, opposite anchorage grounds, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 518, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $200,000; for completing improvement at Craven Shoal in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 557, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, $30,000; in all, $270,000.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to add:

New York Harbor consists of the Upper Bay, 4 miles long and 4 miles wide, connected with the Lower Bay by the Narrows, over a mile in width. The Lower Bay is triangular, extending 12 miles inland, with one side about 6 miles long open to the sea, from which it is separated by a broad bar crossed by five channels. Two of these channels have been improved under this title—Ambrose Channel and the Gedney-Bayside Channel, with its extension, Main Ship Channel. The inner end of these channels is 10 miles south from the Battery, New York City.

The existing project is entirely completed—the Main Ship-Bayside-Gedney Channel in 1891 and Ambrose Channel in 1914. The depth in the Main Ship-Bayside-Gedney Channel has been increased from 23.7 feet to 30 feet. The width, dredged to 1,000 feet, has since decreased to 500 feet in the narrowest part of Main Ship Channel. The depth in Ambrose Channel has been increased from 16 feet to 40 feet over a width of 2,000 feet, and has been fully maintained. The maximum draft which can now be carried through these channels at mean low tide is: Main Ship-Bayside-Gedney Channel, 30½ feet; Ambrose Channel, 40 feet. Ships under steam are liable to draw from 1 to 4 feet or more in excess of their drafts at piers. The 30-foot channel was constructed at 2 per cent above the estimated cost, due to shoaling during progress. The 40-foot channel, estimated to cost $6,688,000, was constructed at a saving of about $1,500,000. In the table following is shown the total expenditures to June 30, 1916:

The funds now available for maintenance, including Ambrose Channel, Gedney and Main Ship Channels, will be applied to maintenance of New York Harbor by collection and removal of drift, under authority of the river and harbor act of 1915, involving expenditures of approximately $5,000 a month during summer and $3,000 a month during winter, and to removal of shoals in the channels as they may occur. The funds available for Ambrose Channel will meet all anticipated expenditures until June 30, 1918, and no further appropriation is now needed. These funds will be applied to the maintenance of United States plant when not at work, and to removal of shoals should any be found in the channel.

The funds estimated for profitable expenditure during the year ending June 30, 1918, it is proposed to apply to maintenance by collection and removal of drift, at the rates of expenditure above named, and to removal of shoals such as may be found to obstruct the channels.

No complete record of domestic or coastwise commerce are available. The following table contains a record of foreign commerce only:

NEW YORK HARBOR, N. Y., UPPER BAY, OPPOSITE ANCHORAGE GROUNDS—NEW PROJECT.

The following report of the Board of Engineers, in which the Chief of Engineers concurs, is printed in House Document 518, Sixty-third Congress, second session:

The main anchorage grounds in upper New York Bay are located on the west side of the main channel, along the Jersey shore, and in order to provide sufficient area these anchorages extend out into the deep water leaving a minimum channel width of 370 feet for vessels drawing 40 feet and over and 1,000 for vessels drawing 30 feet. Experience with enormous traffic in this harbor indicates that this width is insufficient.

To provide the necessary unobstructed channelway, a plan of improvement is proposed for a channel 2,000 feet wide and 40 feet deep, the west side of the channel to skirt the eastern edge of the anchorage grounds. The project proposed is in effect an extension of the Ambrose Channel into and through the upper bay and may be considered as a necessary enlargement of the existing project. An estimate for the excavation of this channel with the regular New York Harbor dredges is presented in the sum of $830,000, and the district officer and the division engineer are of opinion that the demands of navigation are sufficient to warrant the improvement at this cost. No accurate estimate for maintenance can be given, but the district officer states that it will probably not exceed $50,000 annually, and may fall much below that sum.

The dimensions proposed for this channel correspond with those of the Ambrose Channel of entrance to New York Harbor, and it appears from experience that practically such dimensions are required to meet the constantly increasing demands of navigation, particularly during foggy weather, at which time a commodious channel is essential to insure reasonable safety.

NEW YORK HARBOR, N. Y.—REMOVAL OF CRAVEN SHOAL—NEW PROJECT.

Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 557, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session:

Craven Shoal lies in the west part of the main channel from lower New York Bay to upper New York Bay, a mile south of the Narrows and 1¾ miles above the head of Ambrose Channel. The minimum depth on the shoal is 19.6 feet. Sailing vessels and tows of barges are prohibited by law from using Ambrose Channel, but in order to avoid striking the buoys marking Craven Shoal they are practically forced to follow the same track as steamers at this point. The district officer, who is also the division engineer, submits an estimate of cost amounting to $30,000 for removing the shoal to a depth of 30 feet, and expresses the opinion that this work is worthy of being undertaken by the United States. It seems probable that the shoal, once removed, would not form again and the cost of maintenance may be regarded as negligible.

The Clerk read as follows:

HUDSON RIVER CHANNEL, NEW YORK HARBOR.

Hudson River Channel, New York Harbor, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $210,500; for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1697, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, $600,000; in all, $810,500.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to add:

This project (H. Doc. No. 719, 62d Cong., 2d sess.) was adopted by river and harbor act of March 4, 1913, as modified by river and harbor act of March 4, 1915 (see Annual Report for 1914, pp. 234 and 235), and provides for a channel 800 feet wide and 30 feet deep at mean low water from deep water off Ellis Island to 1,300 feet below the foot of Newark Street, Hoboken; thence to Castle Point and the removal of a shoal to a depth of 40 feet; a channel 550 feet wide and 26 feet deep along the Weehawken-Edgewater water front; the removal to a depth of 40 feet of ledge rock lying about 1,000 feet southwest of Pier A at the Battery; the removal of a shoal on the New York side, between West Nineteenth and Thirty-second Streets, to a depth of 40 feet; and the removal of an obstruction north of the mouth of Spuyten Duyvil Creek to the depth of the surrounding river bottom. Estimated cost, $1,570,000. The length of the projected channel in the Jersey City-Hoboken water front is about 3 miles, and of the channel in the Weehawken-Edgewater water front about 5 miles. The total length of river included in the improvement is about 16 miles.

The work done under all projects has resulted in removing rock off Pier A to 38 feet; in dredging a channel in the Jersey City water front 200 feet wide and 30 feet deep; in completing the removal of the shoal in the Hoboken water front to a depth of 40 feet; and in dredging a channel in the Weehawken-Edgewater water front 250 feet wide and 26 feet deep. The controlling depths on June 30, 1916, in the dredged channels are estimated at 30 feet in the Jersey City water front; 40 feet in the Hoboken water front, and 24 feet in the Weehawken-Edgewater water front. Up to June 30, 1916, about 36 per cent of the work proposed under the existing project has been completed, and the total expenditures thereunder amounted to $558,740.68.

To complete the project it is necessary to widen the channels in the Jersey City and Weehawken-Edgewater water fronts, to complete the removal of the rock off Pier A, to remove the shoal on the New York side, and to remove the obstruction north of Spuyten Duyvil Creek.

The funds available June 30, 1916, together with those appropriated by the river and harbor act of July 27, 1916, will be expended in widening, by dredging, the channels along the Weehawken-Edgewater and the Jersey City water fronts. It is expected that this work will be commenced in the fall of 1916, and that the funds will be exhausted about August 1, 1917.

It is proposed to expend the funds, for which estimate is submitted in this report, as follows:

For dredging shoal from West Nineteenth Street to West Thirty-second Street, Manhattan	$185,000
For rock removal, including ledge off Pier A	22,000
For removing obstruction north of Spuyten Duyvil Creek	3,500
Total	210,500

A shoal along the Manhattan water front obstructs the approach of deep-draft steamships to the piers, while the ledge off Pier A lies in the channel used by these vessels. They should therefore be removed as soon as practicable. The obstruction north of Spuyten Duyvil Creek has been the subject of numerous complaints and is a menace to navigation which should be removed.

As the result of a careful canvass, the commerce of the section of the Hudson River included for improvement under this title consists of all classes of commercial products and manufactures, and is as follows:

Comparative statement.

Calendar year.	Short tons.	Value.	Passengers carried.
1913	64,517,302	$2,958,075,917	109,459,665
1914	58,644,614	4,559,185,809	106,253,639
1915	63,458,291	6,410,144,119	69,239,418

The tonnage is carried in vessels ranging in loaded draft from about 7 feet at all stages of the tide up to 38 feet at high water.

HUDSON RIVER CHANNEL, NEW YORK HARBOR, N. Y.—NEW PROJECT.

Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 1697, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session:

The section of the harbor included under the name of Hudson River Channel extends from Ellis Island to the northern limits of New York City, a distance of about 16 miles. The width of the river within these limits varies from 2,725 to 5,400 feet. Originally the widths at various points were much greater, but they have been reduced as a result of water-front improvements and successive advances of the pierhead line to permit the lengthening of piers in keeping pace with the continuing increase in the size of trans-Atlantic steamships. A channel having a mean low-water depth of 40 feet and over and a minimum width of 1,000 feet extends throughout and some distance beyond the section covered by this examination. There are three extensive shoal areas bordering the channel in this reach, however, one off the Jersey City shore, extending from Ellis Island to Castle Point; one on the same shore, from Weehawken to above the northern limits of New York City; and the third on the New York shore, from West Nineteenth to about West Seventy-fifth Street. Some work on each of these shoals is contemplated under the present project, including the removal of the last-named shoal from West Nineteenth Street to West Thirty-second Street. Between West Forty-fourth and West Fifty-sixth Streets the city of New York has undertaken the construction of one pier 1,000 feet long, and proposes to construct two additional long piers at this site practically in continuation of the work now in progress. In order that these piers may be available for use by trans-Atlantic steamships upon completion, the district officer believes that the shoal along this front should be removed to a depth of 40 feet at mean low water from West Thirty-second Street to West Sixty-first Street. Between the Battery and Canal Street the channel is too narrow for safe navigation by the trans-Atlantic vessels, especially in view of the enormous traffic in this section by vessels traveling in all directions. In the opinion of the district officer, giving due consideration to economy, a width of 2,000 feet for the 40-foot channel in this section should be adopted for the present. He reaches the conclusion, in which the division engineer concurs, that the locality is worthy of additional improvement at the present time to the extent indicated, at a total estimated cost of $1,320,000.

The first appropriation should be $600,000, and the balance should be appropriated so as to complete the work within a period of three years.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK HARBOR, BAY RIDGE AND RED HOOK CHANNELS—NEW PROJECT.

New York Harbor, N. Y.: For improvement of Bay Ridge and Red Hook Channels in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 863, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $200,000.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to insert Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 863, Sixty-third Congress, second session:

These channels lie along the east shore of the Upper Bay, New York Harbor, and, with Buttermilk Channel, form an easterly channel along the Brooklyn water front from the Narrows to the East River. The combined length of Bay Ridge and Red Hook Channels is 4½ miles.

The existing project for improvement of these channels, adopted in 1899, provides for a depth of 40 feet and a width of 1,200 feet. The commerce of the locality has grown from about 850,000 tons in 1886 to about 8,500,000 tons in 1913, and much larger vessels are now in use than formerly. The district officer reports that at the lower part of Bay Ridge Channel and the upper part of Red Hook Channel the width of 1,200 feet provided under the existing project is sufficient for present and anticipated needs, but he believes that some widening at and below the bend where Bay Ridge and Red Hook Channels meet is necessary. The area of the proposed widening, as shown on accompanying map, comprises a triangle of approximately 90 acres at the junction of the two channels, the maximum additional width to be obtained being about 1,000 feet where it is most needed. The estimated cost of this work is $920,000. In the opinion of the district officer the further improvement of the locality as proposed is worthy to be undertaken by the United States, and in this opinion the division engineer concurs.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK HARBOR, N. Y., BETWEEN STATEN ISLAND AND HOFFMAN ISLAND—NEW PROJECT.

New York Harbor, N. Y.: For improvement of channel between Staten Island and Hoffman Island in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 625, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, $50,000.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to insert Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 625, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session:

Hoffman Island is mainly an artificial island of about 11.5 acres, situated about 7,000 feet due south from the southeast point of Staten Island. The island belongs to the quarantine department of the port of New York, and is a receiving station for persons suspected of having contagious diseases, or who have been exposed to such diseases. Situated 4,500 feet farther south is Swinburne Island, having an area of about 1.9 acres, which is maintained by the quarantine department for the detention of actual sufferers from contagious disease. Both of these islands are west of the West Bank and can not be approached from the main channel to the east on account of the shoal water. The only approach which is now extensively used is the one from the north, but the depths in this channel are insufficient for vessels of the size best adapted to the quarantine work. The improvement desired by the quarantine authorities is a channel sufficient to accommodate vessels of 15 feet draft, or 16 feet at mean low water. The district officer, who is also the division engineer, submits estimates of cost for providing a channel of this depth and 200 feet wide to Hoffman Island, amounting to $118,000, and for extending the channel to Swinburne Island, amounting to $142,000, a total of $260,000. In view of the importance of the quarantine service to the great commerce of the port of New York, it is advisable for the United States to undertake the improvement of the locality to this extent.

The Clerk read as follows:

WESTCHESTER CREEK, N. Y.—NEW PROJECT.

Westchester Creek, N. Y.: For improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 370, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $58,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to insert Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 370, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session:

Westchester Creek enters an estuary on the north side of East River, about 14 miles east of the Battery, New York City. The present project, adopted by the river and harbor act of June 25, 1910, provides for a channel 8 feet deep at mean low water and 100 feet wide across the estuary; thence 80 feet wide to about 1,000 feet above Scrivens Wharf; and thence 60 feet wide to the head of navigation, at an estimated cost of $91,280. The project is practically completed. The commerce has increased from about 50,000 tons in 1891 to 169,164 tons in 1912 and 589,322 tons in 1914. The existing navigation facilities appear to be inadequate for the proper handling of the vessels engaged in traffic on this stream. The district officer, who is also the division engineer, estimates that to increase the depth to 10 feet and the width to 150 feet, as specified in the river and harbor act of March 4, 1913, will cost $375,000. He deems this expenditure larger than resulting benefits would warrant, but believes the locality is worthy of further improvement to the extent of providing a channel 10 feet deep, 125 feet wide at Unionport and Westchester, and 100 feet wide elsewhere, at an estimated cost of $291,000 for construction and $1,500 annually for maintenance.

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors concurs in general with the views of the district officer, but believes that a width of 100 feet throughout will fairly well serve the needs of commerce, and that any additional width required in order to reach the wharves at Unionport and Westchester should be provided by the interests concerned. The estimated cost of the project as thus modified is $208,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

EAST RIVER, N. Y.—NEW PROJECT.

East River, N. Y.: Continuing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 188, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $500,000: Provided, That so much as may be necessary of this and any other appropriations made for specific portions of New York Harbor and its immediate tributaries may be allotted by the Secretary of War for the maintenance of these waterways by the collection and removal of drift.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to insert Report of the Chief of of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 188, Sixty-third Congress, first session:

The East River forms the eastern entrance to New York Harbor through the waters of Long Island Sound. The existing project for its improvement, adopted in 1868, provides for the removal of certain obstructions to a depth of 26 feet below mean low water. The removal of additional obstructions has been added to this project from time to time, but no change in the project depth has been made, notwithstanding the great increase in size and draft of vessels since the project was adopted. The district officer was of opinion that a depth of 35 feet in the through channel is now required to meet the needs of navigation, and he presented a plan providing for this depth and a width of 900 feet, excepting in the reach west of Blackwells Island and in the short reaches opposite Negro Point and the Sunken Meadows, where the width would be restricted to about 600 feet. The estimated cost of this work is $10,504,500. In addition to the through channel, the district officer was of opinion that certain work should be done to give access to the wharves, and other work should be undertaken to diminish the tidal velocities through Hell Gate. The work required to give access to the wharves involves the removal of a number of shoals and isolated rocks and is estimated to cost $10,451,337. The work recommended primarily for the purpose of reducing tidal velocities consists in the excavation of a channel in Harlem Kills, 480 feet wide and 24 feet deep, at an estimated cost of $4,833,257, and a channel in Little Hell Gate 600 feet wide and 24 feet deep, at an estimated cost of $6,148,629. The plan also contemplates the completion of a channel 400 feet wide and 26 feet deep between North and South Brother Islands and the construction of a channel 300 feet wide and 20 feet deep south of South Brother Island, estimated to cost $215,000 and $380,778, respectively. The total cost of the project proposed by the district officer is $32,533,501. In view of the existing and future commerce of the port of New York and of the urgent need of a fuller utilization of the whole of its water front, he was of opinion that the East River is worthy of further improvement to the extent indicated above.

These reports have been referred, as required by law, to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and attention is invited to the board's accompanying report, dated July 10, 1913. Not being convinced that all the work recommended by the district officer would be justified at present, the board requested that certain revised estimates be secured. The board was not satisfied that the large expenditure proposed for current regulation would result in commensurate benefits, and as the problem of tidal changes at this locality is complex, it believed that it would be better to await the developments that might follow the construction of the Harlem Kills Channel to a depth of 18 feet, which has been recommended by the department but not yet adopted by Congress. The estimated cost of the work recommended by the board for the through 35-foot channel is $8,616,780; for the work required to give access to the wharves, $2,129,458; for channel east of Blackwells Island, $1,877,000; and for other auxiliary work, $775,281, making a total of $13,389,519, or, in round numbers, $13,400,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEWTOWN CREEK, N. Y.—NEW PROJECT.

Newtown Creek, N. Y.: For improvement of Newtown Creek and tributaries in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 936, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $150,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to insert Report of the Chief of Engineers, printed in House Document No. 936, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session:

Newtown Creek empties into East River at a point opposite Thirty-fourth Street, New York City. Dutch Kills, Maspeth Creek, and English Kills are short tributaries of Newtown Creek. The existing project, adopted by the act of June 3, 1896, provides for dredging a channel 18 feet deep at mean low water and 125 feet wide from the mouth to the head of navigation at the intersection of Metropolitan Avenue and Newtown Creek, or East Branch, and to the Metropolitan Avenue Bridge crossing English Kills, or West Branch. The project has been completed. To June 30, 1915, there had been expended on this and previous projects $496,662.55. The mean range of tide is about 4½ feet. The district officer states that the only unusual difficulties of navigation are due to the density of the traffic and the narrowness of the stream.

The deepest draft vessels now using the creek in considerable numbers are the lumber schooners and barges, many of which draw 19 feet when fully loaded. At present such vessels are obliged to operate at or near high tide, at which time the channel is also used by scows destined for the tributary waters where the low-water depths are not sufficient to accommodate them. The commerce of the creek is large and valuable, averaging in recent years about 5,000,000 tons, valued at about $200,000,000. In his report on the survey the district officer, who is also the division engineer, presents a comprehensive plan for further improvement of Newtown Creek and its tributary channels, with alternative estimates of cost for depths of 16, 18, and 20 feet, with an allowance of 2 feet for overdepth dredging in each case. He is of opinion that the locality is worthy of further improvement to the extent of providing a channel 20 feet deep at mean low water, 250 feet wide at the entrance, narrowing to 150 feet, and continuing with this width to Grand Street Bridge on the East Branch, and thence 125 feet wide to Metropolitan Avenue on said branch, including the removal of Mussel Island; 150 feet wide in English Kills, or West Branch, to the Metropolitan Avenue Bridge across said branch, including the easing of bends; 100 feet wide for a distance of 2,000 feet up Maspeth Creek, and 75 to 100 feet wide for a distance of 2,800 feet up Dutch Kills, with a turning basin at the head, all at an estimated cost of $510,000, and $18,000 annually for maintenance. He believes that the locality is worthy of further improvement to the extent indicated, subject to the condition that no work shall be done in Maspeth Creek until its harbor lines have been approved by the Secretary of War and all questions of right of way have been satisfactorily settled without expense to the United States; and that no work shall be done on removal of Mussel Island or on widening the channel above that island or in English Kills until the necessary rights of way have been provided in each case without cost to the United States and corresponding changes have been made in the existing harbor lines.

The Clerk read as follows:

HARLEM RIVER, N. Y.

Harlem River, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $250,000.

Mr. HULBERT. I now wish to add:

The Harlem River and Spuyten Duyvil Creek, both included in the project for improvement, are two tidal waterways of a joint length of about 8 miles, which join at Kingsbridge. They lie wholly within the limits of Greater New York, and separate Manhattan Island from the mainland. The East River entrance is about 8½ miles northeast of the Battery, New York City, and the Hudson River entrance about 13½ miles north of the Battery. The Harlem River also connects with the East River by way of Little Hell Gate, between Wards and Randalls Islands, and by way of Harlem (Bronx) Kills, between Randalls Island and the mainland. These channels are not used by navigators, being shoal, rocky, and winding, with strong tidal currents.

The existing project provides for a continuous channel 400 feet wide and 15 feet deep at mean low water from the East River to the Hudson River, except at Washington Bridge, where the adopted width is 354 feet, and at the rock cut through Dyckmans Meadow, where the adopted width is 350 feet and the depth 18 feet. It also provides for straightening the channel at Johnson Iron Works by making a cut at this point 400 feet wide and 15 feet deep at mean low water; estimated cost, $3,550,000.

About 61 per cent of the work proposed under the existing project has been completed. The work done under all projects has resulted in making a channel 15 feet deep at mean low water and 400 feet wide from the East River to Putnam Railroad Bridge, except at a few points where the channel is somewhat narrowed by shoals, and at Macombs Dam Bridge, where the available depth is 12 feet in the westerly draw opening; the easterly one is not navigable, being obstructed by ledge rock (now in process of removal). From the Putnam Railroad Bridge to the Hudson River the channel is 15 feet deep and from about 150 to 350 feet wide. On June 30, 1916, the maximum available depth for navigation through the Harlem River is estimated at 15 feet at mean low water, except at Macombs Dam Bridge, where it is not more than 12 feet. The widths of channel through bridge draws are 98 to 100 feet. At High Bridge the piers obstruct navigation and cause eddies and high current velocities which render navigation through the bridge channel hazardous; the horizontal clearance normal to the channel between these piers at elevation —5, mean low-water reference, is but about 44 feet. The expenditures under this project to June 30, 1916, amount to $2,022,837.19—$1,980,115.08 for new work, $37,258.59 for maintenance, $963.52 for maps, etc., for which the appropriation was reimbursed by receipts from sales and collections and $4,500 was recovered on the bond of a failing contractor and credited to the appropriation.

To complete the improvement there remains to be done a considerable amount of dredging and rock excavation in several stretches of the river between Madison Avenue Bridge and the Hudson River.

The river and harbor act of June 18, 1878, adopting the existing project for this improvement, and the river and harbor act of March 3, 1879, provided that the necessary right of way should be provided free of cost to the United States before work was begun. This provision was complied with by the State of New York, which procured the necessary lands and completed their transfer to the United States in May, 1887. A similar provision is contained in the river and harbor act of March 4, 1913, authorizing the straightening of the channel at Johnson Iron Works. The river and harbor act of March 4, 1915, provides for the cession to the State of the land occupied by the present channel at that point after the right of way for the cut-off had been provided and the new channel completed. A description of the lands required, with map, has been furnished the State of New York. The prosecution of the work of straightening the channel is awaiting the transfer of these lands.

The funds available June 30, 1916, together with those appropriated by the river and harbor act of July 27, 1916, will be expended for rock removal in the easterly draw channel at Macombs Dam Bridge and for dredging and rock removal from Putnam Bridge to the vicinity of High Bridge. Work at Macombs Dam Bridge is now under way and should be completed in the spring of 1917. It is expected that work above Putnam Bridge will be commenced in the fall of 1916 and that the available funds will be exhausted about June 30, 1917.

It is proposed to expend the funds for which estimate is submitted in this report in continuing the improvement as follows:

For rock removal at Macombs Dam Bridge and in the vicinity of High Bridge	$125,000
For dredging above High Bridge	125,000
	250,000

Ledge rock now obstructs the west-draw channel of Macombs Dam Bridge at a depth of 12 feet. This should be deepened to project depth as soon as the work now under way in the east channel is completed. The removal of the rock ledge in the west side of the channel at High Bridge is necessary to assist in relieving the constriction of the channel at this point. The dredging proposed is for the purpose of continuing the channel of project dimensions to above the mouth of Sherman Creek, at which point a State barge-canal terminal is to be located.

As a result of a careful canvass, the commerce of the Harlem River, mainly in general merchandise, coal, building materials, grain, etc., and ice, appears to be as follows:

Comparative statement.

Calendar year.	Short tons.	Value.	Passengers carried.[1]
1913	18,313,336	$704,984,490	.....
1914	11,577,922	582,383,737	.....
1915	15,096,169	1,538,506,583	454,199

[1] None reported in 1913 or 1914 returns.

Five vessels built and launched in 1915; value, $59,500.

The reduction in the amount of commerce carried on the Harlem River in 1914 below that of previous years is due mainly to removal of a large lumber yard to the East River and an unexplained reduction in the coal tonnage.

Amount expended on all projects from June 18, 1878, to June 30, 1916:
New work	$2,006,578.60
Maintenance	37,258.59
Total	2,043,837.19
Balance available for fiscal year ending June 30, 1917	274,191.47
Amount (estimated) required to be appropriated for completion of existing project	1,290,258.59
Amount that can be profitably expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, for works of improvement	250,000.00

The Clerk read as follows:

Absecon Inlet, N. J.: For maintenance, $45,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 12 and 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, lines 12 and 13, strike out the item.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, Absecon Inlet project has received $300,000 and it has a balance of $43,958 on hand. This item calls for $45,000 more. The depth is 12 feet and is to be 300 feet wide after the project is completed. The commerce in 1915 reached 5,237 tons. The appropriation of 1913 was conditional on the contribution of the locality. The engineers allowed $45,000 unconditionally in 1915. There is a controversy in regard to the authority of the engineers to have made that allotment, but I am not raising that question at this time. What I do say, gentlemen, is that it will cost $45,000 annually to keep that place dredged, whereas the commerce last year was only 5,237 tons. It is one of the newer projects. I believe it is a waste of money and that the item ought to be stricken from the bill or the amount considerably reduced.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment pending to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment. Absecon Inlet is an inlet at the upper end of Atlantic City, N. J. It is known to the people of the United States fully as well as any inlet in this country. It has a harbor for innumerable vessels, many of them of the smaller type, and by virtue of the improvement already made by the Government at this point some steamships have undertaken to do business from Atlantic City direct to New York.

It costs a great deal of money to get commodities to Atlantic City, where the people of the world congregate during the summer time. The trains are congested, and the ocean is available to bring in the heavy freight. A steamship line has been employed now for several years, on promise of an improvement in the channel at Atlantic City, making communication with New York on the outside and with Philadelphia around the other way. It has made a brave effort to keep up these communications.

Absecon Inlet has been the scene of some of the frightful disasters, involving the loss of life, and of some heroic life-saving scenes as well. Atlantic City has pleaded, as has the State of New Jersey—and the people who have come from other States have been witnesses to the pleading—for an improved channel at that point. Shifting sands out in the ocean and varying currents, from time to time, have made perilous the voyages of hundreds of small vessels carrying hundreds of thousands of people from Atlantic City out to the sea every year. Indeed, it seems that if there is one item in this bill that is meritorious this item for improving the inlet at Atlantic City is that item. It involves human life as well as commerce, and the improvement thus far made, and which no State could make because it has to be made out in the ocean itself, has resulted in general good. Not only has it afforded an improved service to passengers who wanted to get out to the fishing banks in the ocean in the summer time, or to get a little of the fresh ozone of the great Atlantic, but it has given inspiration to the men who had capital to invest and who, upon assurance that this work of the Government would go on, were willing to make the investment. If we are to have progress, this amendment will not pass.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Did not the mayor and the committee from Atlantic City contend that this regulated the traffic rates?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why, it has helped rates immensely, and it has given an assurance of safety to the lives of thousands of people who come, not from New Jersey or Atlantic City only but from every State in this Union.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FERRIS). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Raccoon Creek, N. J.: For maintenance, $5,000; completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 800, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $39,770; in all, $44,770.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of the paragraph excepting that which refers to maintenance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 24, strike out all of line 24, and lines 1 and 2 on page 8.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is another new project, but let me say in regard to the last project it proves that the Government is paying about $9 a ton annually to carry 5,000 tons of commerce. I do not suppose that any of these items will be stricken out after presenting a case of that kind without result. There is nothing, so far as I know, in the hearings before the committee or in the reports that indicated the great danger the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] so pleadingly speaks of.

However, that has been determined, and we now come to Raccoon Creek, which I believe is another project up in that same section.

Mr. BROWNING. It is nowhere near it.

Mr. FREAR. There is a balance on hand of $5,643, and the bill asks for a maintenance of $5,000. The present project has been 95 per cent completed. The engineer's report says that the remaining portion of that project is unnecessary. In 1915 there were no operations whatsoever, but $543 was spent for office expenses. There is a small commerce there. It is a new project which is proposed in addition to the old.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. What do you call a small commerce?

Mr. FREAR. A project on which we have spent about $190,000, and on which there was carried 69,000 tons of commerce, of which 35,000 tons is manure, does not sound very large, with only four power boats on the project, according to the engineer's report.

Mr. BROWNING. The engineers do not report that there are only four power boats on the project.

Mr. FREAR. That is from the 1916 report. I am now reading from page 5 of House Document No. 800, Sixty-third Congress.

The traffic of the stream is carried by gasoline boats and barges, by one steamboat plying daily between Bridgeport and Philadelphia, and by occasional steam tugs with barges.

That report was back in 1913. It says further:

A greater width at bottom than 40 feet will be impracticable, without endangering the stability of the banks, but this width will accommodate the existing traffic and permit a substantial increase.

In other words, the Government will not be able to improve this stream beyond 40 feet in width without endangering the banks, which will cave in. So that is the extent of the river in width. It is large enough for present needs.

A short distance below Swedesboro is a highway bridge, shown in detail on the map, which requires proper approaches in the stream and the clearing out of obstructing shoals in one draw opening.

The stream is tortuous in its course, but can not be advantageously straightened by cutting off points or shortened by making cut-offs, because the meadows along the banks have been protected by levees and have been reclaimed to a greater extent than on any other stream in the district. Instead of worthless marsh lands, usually acquired for cut-offs, valuable farm lands would be destroyed, and the price would be out of proportion to the benefits expected.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that there is a maintenance offered on this item, and we have been making appropriations regularly, and that the engineers say that the remaining portion of the original project is wholly unnecessary, that it is only 40 feet wide, all indicates that there is no imperative necessity for this appropriation at this time. I move that it be stricken out.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I think if the gentleman would examine the statistics of Raccoon Creek he would not make the remarks he has just made. Raccoon Creek is a stream of more than 10 miles in length. Swedesboro is situated near the head of this stream, and from that point more farm produce is shipped than from any other point in the State of New Jersey. There is no stream that empties into the Delaware River that carries as much tonnage as does Raccoon Creek, with one exception, Christiana Creek, at Wilmington. Nearly all of the early tomatoes and sweet potatoes that are shipped from Swedesboro to Baltimore and Philadelphia are carried on this stream. That carried to Boston and to New York is shipped by rail. In 1914 34 vessels were regularly employed on Raccoon Creek, using 21 landings and wharves, and handling a commerce amounting to about 92,000 tons. Since that time this commerce has increased, and a large part of the traffic is carried on at the Swedesboro wharves, and it is very necessary that the water be increased to a depth of 7 feet up to that point.

The estimated cost of this proposed improvement is $39,770, with about $5,000 annually for maintenance. This estimate is about $4,400 more than the unappropriated balance for the existing project. The full amount of the estimate, $39,770, should be made available in one appropriation, as pointed out by the Board of Engineers.

And right here, Mr. Chairman, I wish to quote from the report of Maj. R. R. Raymond, engineer in charge, made on May 14, 1913:

He says:

The traffic of the stream is carried by gasoline boats and barges, by one steamboat plying daily between Bridgeport and Philadelphia, and by occasional steam tugs with barges. Mr. Miller reports 34 vessels regularly employed, with an aggregate tonnage of 4,823, and draft between 4 and 6 feet. In 1912 the commerce amounted to 92,688 short tons, valued at $1,163,700. About 21 landings and wharves are used. The incoming freight consists principally of fertilizer, coal, building and road materials, and domestic commodities. The outgoing freght is farm produce, fruits, and truck. Vegetables are shipped in large quantities by rail to Boston and other eastern cities, and by boat to Philadelphia, Chester, and other places on the Delaware River. For shipments of this kind Raccoon Creek ranks near the head of the list of tributaries of the Delaware River and Bay. The heaviest receipts and shipments are made at the wharves at Swedesboro.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have quoted from the report of Maj. Raymond. This project is deserving, and I hope the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment. Supplementing the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING], I wish to say that when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] was on his feet, berating this item of Raccoon Creek—and I say this in all kindness—he had in his hand the report of 1913. He referred to a few cargoes of manure that were carried on this river, but he stopped his reading after he had called up a few gasoline boats and a few barges plying between Bridgeport and Philadelphia.

Now, the gentleman had before him the additional information that was just read by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING], showing what the incoming freight was and what the outgoing freight was. I do not think the gentleman from Wisconsin meant to read only a portion of that report, but I do say that the reading of only a portion of a report and the omission of the meat of it is misleading and unfair when we are endeavoring to discuss the merits of a project like this. I refer to the report of the engineer, dated May 14, 1913, from Wilmington, Del.

Now, the principal objection to Raccoon Creek, in this discussion at least, is its name. There is no reason for opposing Raccoon Creek except that the name does not strike the "fawncy" of some of the men who like to criticize, and, of course, in so emphasizing the word I do not refer to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who is a plain-spoken citizen. The trouble with the great editors is we call it "Raccoon Creek," and if we were to call it "Goose Creek" it would be the same.

Mr. FREAR. Goose Creek does not get anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It may be worthy, but I say it is not fair to strike out an item simply because the name does not strike us favorably. The truth is, as shown by the statistics produced by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING], that Raccoon Creek is one of the liveliest tributaries of the Delaware River.

What goes into Raccoon Creek from these towns of Bridgeport and Swedesboro? Productions from the large cities. Where do they come from? From as far east as Boston, as indicated by the report of the engineer. The people of these towns have to buy something, and there are 21 landings along Raccoon Creek, where the steamers stop to deliver the commodities to the people who live there. That is business.

Now, what goes out of Raccoon Creek? The report indicates farm produce, fruits, and truck. And let me say there is no better farming land in this country than the farm land along Raccoon Creek. That section of New Jersey is prolific in what we call "small truck," and the vessels are coming and going constantly to carry the produce of the farmer—who, I hope, has a few friends left in this House besides myself. [Laughter.] We carry the products of the farmer out of Raccoon Creek to the people of New York and to the people of Boston, and I dare say in the form of canned goods they get even as far as Wisconsin, and——

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And beans. [Laughter.]

Mr. TREADWAY. We have other products in commerce besides beans. The inquiry I was going to propound to the gentleman was if it were not a new turn for the gentleman to be commenting favorably upon the interest of the farmer? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I would say to the gentleman from Massachusetts I am one of the best friends of the farmer in this House. [Laughter.] I have stood here in behalf of the farmer through thick and thin, when some men who shouted a great deal louder about the farmer were not as sincerely interested in him as I was.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Does not the gentleman think the stream would be more popular if it were named "Browning River?"

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be deserving, but "Raccoon Creek" is an honored name in New Jersey. The point I wanted to make for the benefit of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who means well, is that if we would improve the large rivers and the large cities we must pay attention to the small rivers and to the small cities, where the raw products come from; and unless these people who ship their goods from 21 landings along Raccoon Creek have the means to get out to the rest of the world, then we close up their opportunities and we increase the cost of living to the people in the large cities. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. In view of some of the criticisms just made against Raccoon Creek, and those that may be made against other creeks mentioned in this bill, I rise for the purpose of submitting a statement which I have here of the different creeks for which provision is made in the bill. I find 16 of them in all, with appropriations amounting only to $330,170. These creeks, embracing all that are in the bill, accommodate a tonnage of 7,114,202 tons, valued at $169,931,000. The statement should be of interest to both friends and opponents of this class of legislation. I ask unanimous consent to print this with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the memorandum referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Oldmans Creek, N. J.: For maintenance, $5,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this paragraph. The statistics in regard to Oldmans Creek show that a small appropriation of $38,000 has been made. I am trying to ascertain the necessity, if it exists, for these various appropriations which occur in this bill. A balance of $5,647 is on hand. The sum of $5,000 is asked for in this bill. If the doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], which has suddenly been suggested to the committee, is to be carried out, then all these creeks require appropriations. Those who are closest to the farmer forget that when the public-building bill for $38,000,000 was before the House a few days ago, the same gentlemen supported that bill, and the farmers did not come out very well on that, because that was for cities, towns, and villages, and the farmers were not considered. All they had was the to the farmer forget that when the public-buildings bill for $38,000,000. According to the report of the engineers, Oldmans Creek is crooked and obstructed by sharp bends and shallows. As I said, we have appropriated $38,000. In 1915 there were no operations, but $1,089 for office expenses. Will the chairman of the committee kindly explain to me why they spent over $1,000 for office expenses with no improvement to the creek that year? Is there any information about that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say to the gentleman that I have no specific information in regard to this particular item, but that it is customary to charge the office expenses to the appropriation.

Mr. FREAR. Where is the office that would carry that appropriation of $1,000 and over?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think at Philadelphia.

Mr. BROWNING. Wilmington.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey corrects me and states that it is at Wilmington.

Mr. FREAR. It seems to me it is entirely unfair and unreasonable for the engineers to charge $1,089 for office expenses when there was no operation on the stream. I can understand that when an improvement is going on there may be office expenses; but when there is no improvement, why should there be office expenses? The same thing is true of many of these other projects.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Did the gentleman make any effort at the Engineer's Office to find out what the expenses were?

Mr. FREAR. No; but I asked the engineer before the committee, and he could not give any explanation, except that they usually charged 10 per cent. There is no 10 per cent here, because not a dollar was expended on the project, but $1,089 was charged for office expenses. I speak of this because two or three days ago we spent an hour here on the floor of the House discussing a $300 item. Here is a $5,000 item, and $1,089 was expended last year for office expenses when there were no operations on the stream.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman asked the engineer about it—and I do not doubt that he did—certainly the engineer must have misunderstood his question, or he could have answered it.

Mr. FREAR. I did not complain about his answer. I thought it a very proper answer where there were improvements going on; but here is a charge for office expenses with nothing being done on the stream. The Army Engineers further report that this stream has small commerce; that all wharves are private, subject to charge. The statistics were furnished by some firm that is there. I can not believe that $5,000 is really needed in addition to the $5,647 on hand, when we spent nothing last year except for office expenses.

I move to strike out the item.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to reply to a statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] in regard to the item of $1,089. It would have been perfectly easy for the gentleman to discover what that was for if he had wanted to do so. A letter addressed to the Chief of Engineers would have brought him a detailed statement. He had plenty of time to get it. It occurs to me that if I was anxious for information I would seek it at the place where it could be obtained rather than wait to ask upon the floor of the House, in order to see if I could puzzle some one having the bill in charge by asking the question.

Mr. FREAR. I do not want to puzzle anybody.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In other words, it seems to me if a man is really desirous of information he will go where he knows he can get it.

Mr. FREAR. I have been charged with not attending the meetings of the committee, and while I have been working very hard on this matter here is something that I noted, a charge of $1,089 with no improvements on the river, and it seemed to me that I asked a very reasonable and proper question about something concerning which I wished to be informed.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman's observation as a general proposition would be correct. But he says that he asked the engineer himself, and the engineer said he usually charged 10 per cent. That put him on his guard; it passed out of the usual condition, and if there was anything wrong about it, or if there was not anything wrong about it and he was interested in it he was put on his guard, and it having been brought to his attention a letter which he could have dictated in five minutes, addressed to the Chief of Engineers, would have given him all the information called for.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to answer the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin as to what the $1,089 was spent for. Oldmans Creek is in my district. It is the dividing line between Gloucester and Salem Counties. There were improvements made on the creek some years ago—I think in 1912–13. The stream was a very crooked one, and there was a large tract of land contributed to the Government to straighten it, and it was straightened. There has been nothing asked for improvement, although I do not think the whole subject has been completed. This $5,000 is only for maintenance, which must be appropriated to keep up the improvement already made. It would be foolish for the Government to spend its money and then not maintain the depth of water. It is a creek used entirely by the farmers; the farm products go out and what the farmers buy is shipped in.

Mr. FREAR. But there is a balance of $5,647 on hand.

Mr. BROWNING. That can not be used for maintenance. The engineers know better than I do why the $5,000 is required. I do not think they would recommend it if it was not necessary. I hope the item will remain in the bill.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that there was expended during the last fiscal year $1,089.09 for office expenses, and he asked the chairman of the committee to explain the items in that expenditure. I assume that the purpose of that question is to discredit the engineers. He was drawing the inference that the expenditure was unauthorized or discreditable to the engineer.

Now, there are only two references that I find in the engineer's report. One on page 373, under the paragraph of operations and results during the fiscal year, and then follows this language:

No operations in progress; expenditures were for office expenses and inspection, amounting to $1,089.09 for maintenance.

Then, on page 374, under the head "Amount expended during the fiscal year for maintenance of improvement, is the same item, $1,089.09. So it appears from the report of the Chief of Engineers, which are the only references in the report to the matter which the gentleman from Wisconsin called for, is that of its office expenses and inspection for the maintenance of the project. I take it that that answers the question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have heard a good deal in the debate on this bill and on the public-buildings bill about "steal," "robbery," and so forth. I would like to ask whether or not there are projects in this bill now before the committee that are not favorably reported upon by the Army engineers?

Mr. SMALL. Not one.

Mr. SAUNDERS. So that if there are any steals in the bill, they are commended by the Army engineers?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. SAUNDERS. And there has been some suggestion to turn over a lump sum to be expended by these very Army engineers?

Mr. SMALL. That is true.

Mr. SAUNDERS. And now that we are following their judgment in respect to this particular bill, we are denounced as being abettors of that steal?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from Wisconsin is attempting to discredit the engineers with whom he proposes to place a lump-sum appropriation. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Alloway Creek, N. J.: For maintenance, $2,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that in order that I may make some explanation in regard to the question just put by the gentleman from Virginia to the gentleman from North Carolina. I have not said that this was a steal. I know that a distinguished Democrat at the other end of the Capitol once called it a humbug and a steal.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I did not use his name in connection with that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will yield just a moment, I think the gentleman's language in reference to the distinguished Democrat at the other end of the Capitol might be misunderstood. He did not refer to this bill as a steal.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no; that is true; it was a former river and harbor bill. Now, in reference to the Army engineers, I have said that there is no doubt that on many projects there is much waste. I never claimed it to be a steal, but you can not get a single item out of the bill—the upper Mississippi, the lower Mississippi, or the Missouri—in order to limit the total amount of expenditures, and thereby reduce the amount of the waste. The only way is to do as we did two or three years ago—limit the total amount and place it in the hands of the Army engineers and make them responsible for the use of the money. I did not believe that the way they apportioned the money the last time was right, but I do not see how you can otherwise reduce the total amount of the bill.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. In the speech which the gentleman made last year, did he not very severely criticize the Army engineers for the manner in which they made the allotments?

Mr. FREAR. Why, I did, or certainly ought to have done so; but we can not get any reduction except to reduce the total amount. I do not think their allotment was any better than that of the committee, so far as it went, but there was less waste because there was less money to spend.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then, I gather that the criticism that appears in the newspapers and on the part of various critics in the House of Representatives to the effect that this bill is a steal is not well taken, is not justified by the facts.

Mr. FREAR. I do not know what the gentleman is referring to. Of course, I can answer only for myself and not for others.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman can answer whether or not in his judgment those epithets which have been freely used in connection with this bill are justified.

Mr. FREAR. I have not seen those epithets.

Mr. SAUNDERS. An editorial appearing in one of these northern papers the other day was to that effect.

Mr. FREAR. I will say this, that I think it is full of waste.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then this becomes a matter of judgment.

Mr. FREAR. Surely. That is all our legislation results from, anyway.

Mr. SAUNDERS. And the committee is backed in their judgment by the judgment of these Army engineers.

Mr. FREAR. Unquestionably so; and, referring to the gentleman from North Carolina, who is complaining about the amount used for office expenses, they appropriated over $230,000 for office expenses and inspection in one appropriation.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is suggested to me by my colleague on my right, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. GALLAGHER], that in addition to the House having the confirmatory judgment of these engineers, it also has the judgment of the Secretary of War.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; but the Secretary of War follows the judgment of the Army engineers. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not stand alone in this. One hundred and forty Members of the House held the same belief at the last session, and the bill was passed in the Senate by only 1 vote. I am not standing alone in this proposition. Every gentleman who has a project here believes that the bill ought to go through; but I do not believe the bill is above criticism, and I am endeavoring to criticize it fairly.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pittsburgh Harbor, Pa.: For maintenance, $5,000.

Mr. NORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose at this time of extending my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill by having printed therein the report of the Chief of Engineers of 1916, respecting the rivers and harbors of the Pittsburgh (Pa.) district, and some personal correspondence relative to the improvement of the Allegheny River.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

REPORT OF CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY, 1916, RIVERS AND HARBORS, PITTSBURGH (PA.) DISTRICT, AND CORRESPONDENCE OF HON. S. TAYLOR NORTH RELATIVE TO THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE ALLEGHENY RIVER DURING THE SIXTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

3. ALLEGHENY RIVER, PA.—OPEN-CHANNEL WORK.

Location and description: The Allegheny River rises in northern Pennsylvania, flows northwestward into New York, and thence southward to Pittsburgh, Pa., where it joins with the Monongahela River to form the Ohio. Its length is 325 miles. (See U. S. Geological Survey charts for Pennsylvania and New York, unnumbered.) The drainage area is 11,580 square miles, low-water discharge 1,440 cubic feet per second, and highest measured discharge 286,834 cubic feet per second. High or low water may occur at any time, but most of the freshets come in the late winter and spring. The river is nontidal and the current rapid. The average fall per mile of navigable portion—i. e, from Olean, N. Y., to the mouth, is 2.2 feet. The average width varies gradually from 225 feet at Olean to 1,060 at the mouth.

Original condition: The river originally contained obstructive bowlders, snags, islands, bars, and shoals, making navigation hazardous and practicable only at the highest stages. The channel width was extremely variable. The minimum, safe, usable low-water depth was about 3 feet. Rafting, logging, and light steamboating extended from Olean, N. Y., to Pittsburgh, Pa., a distance of 255 miles.

Previous projects: None.

Existing project: This project was adopted by the river and harbor act of March 3, 1879, which contemplated the removal of bowlders and snags and the construction of low dams and dikes to close secondary channels and concentrate the low-water flow on the shoals between French Creek and the mouth, 126 miles. The approved estimate of cost of the original work was $51,425. (H. Ex. Doc. No. 21, 46th Cong., 3d sess., and reprinted in Annual Report for 1879, p. 1371.) The project was extended by the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882, to include similar improvements from French Creek to the New York State line, 88 miles. The approved estimate of cost of original work from French Creek to Olean, N. Y., 129 miles, was $40,000. (S. Ex. Doc. No. 89, 46th Cong., 2d sess.) The total length of section included in the project from the mouth to New York State line is 214 miles. A well-defined navigable channel from 150 feet wide and about 1 foot deep, at low water at the New York State line to 300 feet wide and approximately 2 feet deep at low water at the head of Pool No. 3, at Natrona, Pa., 25 miles above the mouth, has been established by the removal of all obstructive bowlders and snags and the construction of 10 low dams and dikes. For locks and dams contemplated see report on construction of locks and dams. The only published map of the Allegheny River appears in House Document No. 740, Sixty-third Congress, second session, page 1002. No estimate for maintenance was ever made.

Operations and results during the fiscal year: No work of construction was performed. Inspections were made of work being done under department permits and to prevent channel encroachments. The inspection expenditures amounted to $584.07 and were charged to maintenance.

Condition at the end of fiscal year: Ten low dams and dikes to close secondary channels and concentrate the low-water flow on shoals were completed by 1898. These regulating works, although needing repairs, still perform their functions. All rock and snag obstructions were removed from New York State line to mouth, 214 miles, by 1904. A milldam at Corydon was modified in 1887 and entirely removed in 1910. No further new work is contemplated. The work done permits safe navigation at stages from 2 to 3 feet lower than formerly. The navigable depth varies gradually with location and greatly according to seasonal conditions. Slack-water improvement from Natrona, Pa., to the mouth has reduced the open-channel distance by 24 miles. The total expenditure for original work was $197,000 and for maintenance $73,883.61, a total of $270,883.61.

Local cooperation: None.

Effect of improvement: Water transportation has been rendered easier and safer. Whether the improvement has caused reduction in freight rates or prevented their increase is not known. Rail rates are much higher than actual cost of water transportation. For similar commodities railroad freight rates are considerably higher in the Allegheny Valley than in the Monongahela where the river is well improved for upward of 130 miles. This condition is believed to exist largely because of the limited slack-water improvement completed on the Allegheny and the restrictions upon navigation due to the obstructive bridges at the mouth, which together prevent the full utilization of this waterway.

Proposed operations: It is proposed to use the funds which are shown as available for the year ending June 30, 1917, as follows:

To reconstructing the stone-filled and paved cribwork dike at Red Bank across a gap 118 feet wide by 7.5 feet in height, a second gap 225 feet wide by 5 feet in height, 600 linear feet of top cribwork 3 feet in height with stone filling and paving, and renewing sundry timbers, stone filling, and paving on other parts of dike	$11,000.00
To recovering and replacing in a 530-foot gap in the dam at Nicholsons Island, 1,200 cubic yards of old and 600 cubic yards of new stone	2,500.00
To minor repairs to other dikes and dams and channel in general and contingencies	2,240.91
Total	15,740.91

It is expected that about one-third of the funds available, $15,740.91, will be used in October and November, 1916, and the remainder from May to October, 1917, at the rate of about $2,100 per month. No additional appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1918, is recommended.

Commercial statistics: There is given below a comparative statement of the commerce on the open river above slack water which consisted principally of sand, gravel, and dredged waste material. For 1915 the tonnage was distributed among these classes as follows: Sand, 61 per cent; gravel, 31 per cent; dredged waste material, 7 per cent; leaving 1 per cent for miscellaneous items. The usual limit of draft for this commerce is about 4 feet. During the year 7 towboats and 10 sand-and-gravel dredges were operated.

4. ALLEGHENY RIVER, PA., CONSTRUCTION OF LOCKS AND DAMS.

Location and description and original condition: See report on Allegheny River, Pa., open-channel improvement.

Previous projects: None.

Existing project: The existing canalization project extends from the mouth to Rimerton, Pa., 61 miles, and contemplates the construction of eight locks and dams as follows:

Lock and Dam No. 1 by the river and harbor act of August 5, 1886; Locks and Dams Nos. 2 and 3 by the river and harbor act of June 3, 1896; and Locks and Dams Nos. 4 to 8, inclusive, by the river and harbor act of July 25, 1912, appropriating $300,000, provided that local interests contribute an equal amount, as modified by the river and harbor act of March 4, 1913, revoking above condition and reappropriating $300,000, provided—

"that no part of said amount shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall have received satisfactory assurances that the channel spans of the bridges forming unreasonable obstructions to the navigation of the Allegheny River at Pittsburgh will be modified as recommended by a board of engineer officers in a report dated November 23, 1910."

The estimate of cost of original work was $3,888,000. (Annual Reports 1891, p. 2366; 1896, p. 2214; and H. Doc. No. 540, 62d Cong., 2d sess.)

The purpose of the construction of Locks and Dams Nos. 1 to 8, inclusive, is to provide a least slack-water depth of 7 feet at normal level of the pools. This has been accomplished in completed Locks 1, 2, and 3 for widths varying from about 200 feet at the narrowest shoals to approximately 800 feet at the widest natural pools, except that at the head of Fourteen Mile Island the navigable depth is only 6.5 feet at the normal level of pool No. 2. When movable Dams Nos. 1, Allegheny and Ohio Rivers, are down the open-channel depth below Lock No. 2 is occasionally reduced during low-water periods to 4 feet. The only published map of the Allegheny River appears in House Document No. 740, Sixty-third Congress, second session, page 1002.

NOTE.—Data for Locks and Dams Nos. 4 to 8 inclusive, are tentative.

Operations and results during the fiscal year: No work was done.

Condition at end of fiscal year: Lock and Dam No. 1 were completed in December, 1902, at a cost of $594,373.07; Lock and Dam No. 2 in October, 1908, at a cost of $544,947.90; and Lock and Dam No. 3 in December, 1904, at a cost of $315,103.36. These dams furnish slack water from the mouth to Natrona, Pa., 24 miles. The minimum available depth at normal pool stage is 6.5 on a bar in Pool No. 2. Available drafts usually vary from 6 to 7 feet from March to December to 4 to 7 feet during the winter months. The lower limits above stated occur in Pool No. 1 when the movable dam is down on account of danger from ice. Locks and Dams Nos. 4 to 8, inclusive, intended to extend slack water from Natrona, Pa., to Rimerton, Pa., 37 miles, remain to be built. In January, 1907, the abutment of Dam No. 3 failed and a portion of the dam was blown out. These parts were restored at a cost of $238,682.57. To the beginning of the fiscal year there was expended for new work $1,454,424.33, and for maintenance $238,815.07, a total of $1,693,239.40.

Local cooperation: No special conditions were imposed by law, nor was there any local cooperation in the building of Locks and Dams Nos. 1, 2, and 3. As regards Locks and Dams Nos. 4 to 8, the river and harbor act of March 4, 1913, imposed the condition that no part of the funds appropriated for their construction is to be expended until the Secretary of War shall have received satisfactory assurance that the channel spans of the bridges forming unreasonable obstructions to the navigation of the Allegheny at Pittsburgh will be modified. Such assurance has not been received.

Effect of improvement: Safe navigation for drafts of 4 to 7 feet during fully 75 per cent of the year has been established from the mouth to Natrona, Pa. No noticeable reduction in freight rates has occurred, nor will likely occur until additional locks and dams are completed and obstructive bridges at Pittsburgh are modified. Rail rates are much higher than actual cost of present water shipments.

Proposed operations: Pending the fulfillment of the conditions imposed by Congress precedent to the commencement of work on Locks and Dams Nos. 4 to 8, no work is planned for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and no estimate of funds submitted for the year following.

Recommended modifications of project: None.

Commercial statistics: There is given below a comparative statement of the commerce on the slack-water portion of the river from Natrona to the mouth, consisting principally of coal, sand, gravel, steel billets, and dredged waste material. For 1915 the tonnage was distributed among these classes as follows: Coal, 39.9 per cent; sand and gravel, 49.1 per cent; steel billets, 6.8 per cent; and dredged waste material, 3.5 per cent. The usual limits of draft for this commerce are 6 to 8½ feet for coal and steel and 4 to 7½ feet for sand and gravel. During the year 16 towboats and 12 sand dredges were operated.

5. OPERATING AND CARE OF LOCKS AND DAMS, ALLEGHENY RIVER, PA.

The improvement for which report is made under this caption forms part of the project for Allegheny River, Pa., construction of locks and dams, for which report is made on pages 1226 to 1229 of this report, where general information regarding the improvement can be found. The work carried on is the operation and maintenance of the locks and dams reported on page 1227 as completed. These locks and dams have been operated and maintained under the permanent indefinite appropriation as follows: No. 1, since January 1, 1903; No. 2, since November 10, 1906; and No. 3, since November 29, 1904.

Operations and results during the fiscal year: The locks and dams were maintained in good condition and operated as occasion required. Repairs of minor importance to the structures and operating plants were made by hired labor. The patrol of the banks to prevent unauthorized deposits and the inspection of work done under department permits were continued. Four stream-gauging stations were maintained during the year. The amount expended during the fiscal year was $42,991.99.

Condition at the end of fiscal year: All structures were in a good state of repair and the pools in satisfactory navigable condition. For controlling depths see report on Allegheny River, Pa., construction of locks and dams. The total amount expended to the end of the fiscal year was $530,838.66.

Proposed operations: The locks and dams will be operated and maintained under allotments from the permanent indefinite appropriation provided by section 6 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909.

Commercial statistics: There is given below a comparative statement of that part of the traffic, in short tons, which passed the locks during the past three calendar years:

Lock.	1913		1914		1915

ALLEGHENY RIVER IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION,
Kittanning, Pa., January 10, 1916.

Hon. S. TAYLOR NORTH, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Dispatches from Washington published in the Pittsburgh Sunday papers intimate your intention to introduce a bill in Congress for the improvement of the Allegheny River or seek to incorporate an appropriation therefor in the event of a rivers and harbors bill during this session.

As a matter of information, to guide you in so important and commendable a step, it would be well to understand that an appropriation has been made for the improvement of the Allegheny River in the Sixty-second Congress, which does not lapse with each succeeding Congress, but which is as useless at present as though it did lapse and required action de novo.

The attached letter of the Allegheny River Improvement Association, of which I am president, was sent out yesterday to all interests of the Allegheny Valley. The letter is self-explanatory, and will help you to a knowledge of the present situation concerning the river improvement.

The present varied and extensive industries of the Allegheny River Valley above the city of Pittsburgh and those interested in the development of its great natural resources feel that an injustice has been done by Congress in subordinating the improvement of the river to the interests of the city of Pittsburgh, assisted perhaps by some of the interests of the Monongahela and Youghiogheny Valleys who are adverse to the competition which the development of the Allegheny River would produce. The Pittsburgh bridge fight is something in the nature of a personal row of Capt. Rogers et al. against the Pennsylvania Railroad et al. that has been on for perhaps 20 years. In effect it is a plan to perpetuate a particular type of steamboat now in use on the Ohio River and ill adapted to low bridges, and also quite an unnecessary type of boat to successful navigation in the event of the improvement of the Allegheny River. The work of this association has been hampered—in fact, temporarily usurped—by the steamboat interests largely engaged in Ohio River traffic, and this is how we now happen to be in such distressing difficulties in getting the appropriation released, and is therefore the occasion for the hearing referred to in the attached letter.

You, with all other intelligent men, appreciate that the removal of obstructions to navigation is ordinarily made concurrent with the demand for such removal. Therefore to subordinate the improvement of the river to the removal of bridges in advance of the development of the facilities for slack-water navigation is an unwarranted, unreasonable procedure, having no purpose other than that of defeating the project and perpetuating a controversy in regard to the clearances of bridges in the Pittsburgh district, which partakes more of the nature of a subterfuge and personal animus than it does of good judgment or sound sense.

If the development of governmental facilities for transportation or those undertaken by a private or corporate enterprise attempted to remove obstructions prior to the necessity therefor, it would involve a waste of capital contrary to not only all precedent, but abortive of business acumen in every sense of the word.

When the necessity for the modification of the bridge clearances in the Pittsburgh district is made manifest by the presence of facilities on the Allegheny River for slack-water navigation and the assured tonnage that will follow such an improvement discloses the character and extent of the obstruction to navigation, then is sufficient time for the exercise of the prerogative of Government which seeks to conserve the public welfare, and order such modifications in the bridges as may seem proper and reasonable. The efforts of the interests of the Allegheny River Valley for the improvement of the river have been thwarted by restrictions attaching to the appropriation that can be regarded not only as subterfuges and sophistries but as being unreasonable in the basic principle upon which they were inserted into the act. If these restrictions can be removed from the present appropriation, then the people of this valley will feel encouragement that the Congress of the United States is in earnest in the same sense that we are in earnest in our endeavors for this improvement, otherwise we must continue our efforts in the hope that some time, somehow, we shall be favored with an enactment that will free us from the present legislative obstructions.

Presumably the hearing in Pittsburgh on the 25th of January is the logical course in the present status of affairs, but as the matter of raising the bridges is contended against by both the city of Pittsburgh and by corporate interests located therein, it is certain that the Secretary of War will get no assurances that the bridges will be raised, and the situation will remain statu quo indefinitely, for by the express wording of the act the appropriation is not to be released until he receives those assurances, and it is nothing short of simple folly to imagine that the parties contending against any modification of the bridges are going to give a favorable answer to the inquiry. I am therefore bound in the proper performance of my duty, supported unanimously by the asssociation, that the Pittsburgh bridge controversy shall not overshadow and become the means of defeating the improvement of the river, for which latter purpose earnest and conscientious endeavor has been and will continue to be made.

I have devoted much time and consideration to this subject. It is a meritorious project. It will conserve a public need of great magnitude, and it ought to receive every consideration at the hands of Congress. I am at your service in trying to correct what now stands as an imposition on the valley interests and as a contemplated expense of over $1,500,000 upon public and corporate investments in the city of Pittsburgh in advance of the time it is necessary that the expense should be incurred. What we should have is an appropriation made in the same manner that has governed all other appropriations for improved navigation where it conserved public welfare, and when in time it shall have been demonstrated that the bridges in Pittsburgh are obstructing the proper development of an improved watercourse the executive branch of Government is now clothed with sufficient authority to correct such an evil, if complained of.

Very truly, yours,

DWIGHT C. MORGAN,
President.

ALLEGHENY RIVER IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION,
Kittanning, Pa., January 10, 1916.

Hon. S. TAYLOR NORTH, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the matter of the improvement of the Allegheny River, according to the plans and specifications of the Government engineers, approved by the rivers and harbors act of March 4, 1913, and making an initial appropriation of $300,000 for the work, it was provided in the rivers and harbors act that no part of said amount shall be expended until the Secretary of War shall have received satisfactory assurance that the channel spans of the bridges forming unreasonable obstructions to navigation of the Allegheny River at Pittsburgh will be modified as recommended by a board of engineer officers in a report dated November 23, 1910.

It therefore having been made incumbent upon the Allegheny Valley interests desiring the improvement of the river to urge upon the Secretary of War the action contemplated and set forth by the act of Congress, a petition and brief was prepared by Mr. Albert Dettinger, attorney and counselor, Cincinnati, Ohio, reviewing the facts in connection with the bridges in the Pittsburgh district. An answer to this petition and brief was filed by certain interests in the city of Pittsburgh and Allegheny County adverse to disturbing such bridges as were regarded as unreasonable obstructions to navigation. A reply brief was in turn submitted by the petitioners, thereby placing before the Secretary of War all data and information concerning the matter of bridges, as affecting the release of the appropriation made by the Congress of the United States for the improvement of the river.

In compliance with instructions received from the Secretary of War by the Department of Government engineers at Pittsburgh, a hearing was called in the chamber of commerce in that city at 10 o'clock a. m., December 2, 1915, at which time Francis R. Shunk, lieutenant colonel, Corps of Engineers, explained the purpose of the meeting, and inasmuch as it was desired that all matters pertaining to the questions at issue should be presented in writing, the meeting was adjourned until Tuesday, January 25, 1916, at 10 o'clock, in room No. 311, post-office building, Pittsburgh, at which time the presentation of data and further discussion of the subject will be had.

Immediately following the meeting held in the chamber of commerce December 2, 1915, such interests as were represented by the Allegheny River Improvement Association outside of the city of Pittsburgh held a meeting in the Fort Pitt Hotel, and it was decided to report the situation to the interests of the Allegheny Valley, and to urge for presentation at the meeting to be held January 25 such written statements from all those interested in the improvement of the river as could be secured. These statements should include the resources, developed and undeveloped, of the valley, the amount and nature of the manufacturing industries, the probable products, in kind and amount, that would be likely to seek water transportation, if it were available, and the saving in freight costs that would follow. The improvement association authorized the president to appoint a committee of the association to carry out this work, and I have great pleasure in selecting you as a member of this committee, to do what you may be able to do personally and by enlisting the assistance of such others interested in the development of the valley as you may be able to reach through your personal acquaintance and influence.

The improvement of the Allegheny River is separate and apart from the bridge controversy, which has been unfortunately made a temporary barrier to its improvement, but it may be regarded with some degree of certainty that unless the interests of the valley disclose with proper assurances the importance and benefits to be derived from the improvement of the river, then just that long can it be expected that the bridge situation in the Pittsburgh district will become the paramount issue, and the development of the valley retarded for want of knowledge and appreciation of its developed and undeveloped resources that would be benefited by a system of slack-water navigation, as recommended by the Government engineers. It is therefore important that the real interests of the Allegheny Valley should not be overlooked in the issue now up for consideration, and it is earnestly hoped that you will give your assistance in order that we may achieve the purposes for which this organization was formed, and which it is believed can by concerted action be useful in accomplishing the improvement of the river. Will you not therefore give support to the matter in the form of a letter setting forth the facts desired, addressed to Francis R. Shunk, lieutenant colonel, Corps of Engineers, Pittsburgh, Pa., by January 25, 1916, the date set for the hearing, and if you can also be present on that occasion in behalf of the development of the Allegheny Valley it will strengthen the earnestness of our position and endeavor for the improvement of the river.

Very truly, yours,

DWIGHT C. MORGAN,
President.

Hon. DWIGHT C. MORGAN,
President Allegheny River Improvement Association,
Kittanning, Pa.

DEAR MR. MORGAN: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your valued favor of recent date relative to an appropriation for the improvement of the Allegheny River for slack-water navigation. As this improvement is principally the boundary on the west side of my congressional district I have given it considerable study. I have had the experience of running many rafts of timber down the Mahoning and Allegheny to the Pittsburgh markets and realize the great benefits to be derived by this improvement by the entire valley. In preparing this legislation I assure you that it will not contain any restrictions whatever.

I highly appreciate the kindly and helpful suggestions you have made in connection with this legislation and assure you that I stand ready to serve you and the Allegheny River Improvement Association when possible for me to do so.

I beg to remain, very truly, yours, S. TAYLOR NORTH.

DEAR MR. NORTH: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of January 15, in reply to my letter concerning the improvement of the Allegheny River. I feel very sure that any activities on your part toward having the present restriction to the appropriation removed would be appreciated.

I also beg to acknowledge receipt of bill you have introduced for a post-office building in Kittanning. This is a very much needed improvement, and I trust your efforts in regard to both of the propositions, viz, the improvement of the river and a post-office building, will be urged by you to the fullest extent, and that we may realize on your efforts in those directions.

Very truly, yours, DWIGHT C. MORGAN.
Vice President.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I would be pleased to have a copy of the hearings recently submitted to you by Col. Shunk relative to raising the bridges over the Allegheny River at Pittsburgh, Pa.

Thanking you in advance, I am,
Respectfully, S. TAYLOR NORTH.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, June 24, 1916.

Hon. S. TAYLOR NORTH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Your communication of June 22, 1916, in regard to furnishing you with a copy of Col. Shunk's report in the matter of the raising of the bridges over the Aliegheny River at Pittsburgh, Pa., has been received.

In reply I beg to inform you that the report has been received in this office, but sufficient opportunity has not been had to thoroughly digest its contents and to examine into the voluminous records, exhibits, etc., which accompany it. The instructions of former Secretary of War (Mr. Garrison) in his memorandum of September 30, 1915, in regard to the matter are as follows:

"My conclusion, therefore, is to refer these cases in the usual course to the Chief of Engineers, with instructions to proceed in the usual way, giving full notice and opportunity to all parties in interest to produce every relevant fact. I shall, in addition to the usual instructions, insert a direction that, to the extent that they are able to do so, they shall in their report indicate the identity of facts which were before Secretary Root, so that I may be able to determine whether any new facts—and if so, what new facts—are in the new record.

"Upon the coming in of the report from the engineers I desire that notice be given to everybody in interest, accompanied by a copy of the report, the notice to be to the effect that upon a certain day fixed all parties who have any objection to the confirmation of the report and concurrence in its recommendations must file their objections in writing with me, stating each objection and the reason for it. If objections of the character just mentioned are filed, a day will then be set by me when I will sit and hear arguments of all the parties in interest."

It will be seen from the foregoing that the matter will require extensive consideration by the Chief of Engineers, and also that the procedure contemplates furnishing everybody in interest with a copy of the report at the proper time, with an opportunity to file a brief. Your request will be filed until that time, when it will receive further consideration.

Very respectfully,

W. M. BLACK,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Subject: Bridges over Allegheny River at Pittsburgh, Pa.

An error has been discovered in the report of the Chief of Engineers to the Secretary of War of August 8, 1916, concerning the bridges over the Allegheny River at Pittsburgh. In line 12, page 48, the last two figures should be 4.0 and 12.3 feet, instead of 11.0 and 19.3 feet. It is requested that the figures be corrected in the copy of report furnished you to avoid any future possible misunderstanding in this respect.

ENGINEER IN FAVOR OF CHANGE—COL. JADWIN SAYS RAISING BRIDGES WOULD BENEFIT CITY—INDUSTRIES ARE VITAL.

The point of view of the Pittsburghers and Pittsburgh interests which favor the raising the Allegheny River bridges was yesterday given to the Dispatch by Col. Edgar Jadwin, Government engineer in charge of navigation in the Pittsburgh district. It is vigorously denied that the bridge-raising movement is a selfish propaganda, designed to aid other sections of the country at the expense of this city.

Col. Jadwin, in consenting to talk for publication, departs somewhat from the customary practice of Army men, but it is understood that he does so by permission of his superiors. This would indicate that the bridge-raising fight is now at a more critical stage than ever before and that certain very powerful interests are determined to "go through."

Col. Jadwin's attention was called to the fact that an organization of business men was being formed to oppose bridge raising, and he was asked to discuss the effect of the proposed raising upon the city's prosperity independent of its general effect upon navigation. After consulting with some of his associates he consented to do so and said:

"A number of your largest manufacturing companies urged us to have the bridges raised. These include the Carnegie Steel Co., Pittsburg Plate Glass Co., United States Aluminum Co., the Atlantic Refining Co., the Crucible Steel Co., and others. Two of these alone have put us on notice that they desire to increase their shipments on the Allegheny River within the next five years by an amount of over 1,600,000 tons. This class of freight is now saving on an average of 50 cents a ton on the Monongahela and Ohio Rivers in being hauled by water instead of by rail. At this rate the economic saving resulting from the new business of these companies alone will be in excess of $800,000 per year.

MINES MUST BE WORKED.

"Think of this for a moment and bear in mind that few large and important cities exist save on a navigable body of water. Pittsburgh is situated at the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, forming the Ohio. The rivers must remain. The mines must be worked here. The railroads entering Pittsburgh will doubtless remain so long as the traffic justifies. Should a withdrawal be conceivable, others would replace them, if needed for handling the tonnage. It is possible for the manufacturing establishments, in the absence of the best and most convenient facilities for transportation, to withdraw to other localities. The Pittsburg Plate Glass Co. has established a plant in Missouri, where it can not be deprived of a satisfactory navigation. The United States Aluminum Co., with a plant at New Kensington, on the Allegheny, has also similarly established a plant in Missouri. With the Allegheny River improved the glass company considers the location in the Allengheny Valley better for its purpose than any other part of the country. However, if relief is not afforded, they can eventually remove.

"The steel companies in prosperous times, when a mill becomes too old or is too uniformally deteriorated to modernize, build a new mill of the latest type in the best location. When business contracts they shut down the old mill and run the new, only using the old thereafter as a reserve. Should manufacturers generally remove from the Pittsburgh industrial region the railroads would follow the trade. As the matter now stands, all railroad traffic in the Pittsburgh region passes over more than a dozen railroad bridges at an elevation satisfactory to navigation interests, except the comparatively small quantity of freight carried over the lower elevation tracks of the Pennsylvania Railroad bridge at Eleventh Street. This, as well as the other, can be satisfactorily carried at the upper elevation of tracks of that bridge, and at no unreasonable cost for the necessary changes. Also, the traffic passing over the highway bridges in question can well be carried at the elevation conforming to the heights of bridges recommended by Lieut. Col. Shunk.

TRANSPORTATION IMPORTANT.

"In other words, the future development and progress of Pittsburgh and the Allegheny Valley do not depend upon the effect of 8 to 12 feet difference in the elevation of the obstructive bridges crossing the Allegheny River on overhead traffic, but rather to holding its industrial supremacy, which depends primarily and ultimately upon its mills remaining. The mills should, therefore, be given the advantage of cheap water transportation for moving heavy bulk freight. With these assured, the growth of the city and valley can hardly be stopped. But deprived thereof by low-level bridges in perpetuity, they can not come into their own."

Acting in accordance with a resolution adopted at a meeting of representatives of many business interests with large financial investments in the downtown section of the city Monday afternoon to protest against the raising of the bridges over the Allegheny River, William McConway, temporary chairman of that meeting, yesterday selected the following men to form a permanent organization: Wilson S. Arbuthnot, of the Arbuthnot-Stephenson Co.; Herbert L. May, of the May Drug Co.; Alexander P. Moore, of the Pittsburg Leader; A. H. Smith, of the Alling & Cory Paper Co.; and Harry S. Calvert, of the Enameled Products Co.

The purpose of the committee will be to perfect a plan and form a permanent organization to protest against the raising of the bridges over the Allegheny River. The business men held their first meeting in the assembly room of the Oliver Building Monday afternoon. This meeting was the first organized protest against the raising of the bridges, and upon organization the body will formally present its protest against the bridge raising to Secretary of War Newton D. Baker.

The county commissioners yesterday had white marks placed on the Sixth Street Bridge at the height to which the floor of the bridge will have to be raised, if the change is ordered.

JANUARY 11, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I would be pleased to have you advise me what conclusion your department has come to in regard to raising the bridges over the Allegheny River at Pittsburgh, Pa. I am desirous of having an appropriation incorporated in the present rivers and harbors bill to continue the improvement of this river, in accordance with the engineers' estimates, provided the bridge controversy has been settled.

Thanking you for an early reply, I am,
Very respectfully, yours,
S. TAYLOR NORTH.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 13, 1917.

Hon. S. TAYLOR NORTH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 11th instant I beg to inform you that no conclusion has as yet been reached in regard to the raising of the bridges over the Allegheny River at Pittsburgh. The counsel in the case were given until January 1 to file supplemental briefs, at which time I expected to commence my examination of the record with a view to deciding the controversy as quickly as possible. It appears that some delay has been encountered by counsel in getting their briefs printed and filed, but I expect to take the matter up for consideration shortly. I can not say at this time just how long it may take before a decision can be rendered, but I expect to expedite it as much as possible consistent with a thorough understanding of the situation and full consideration of the matters involved.

Very respectfully,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Hon. S. M. SPARKMAN,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: In view of anticipated favorable action by the Secretary of War relative to raising the bridges over the Allegheny River at Pittsburgh, Pa., thereby releasing an appropriation of $300,000 heretofore made for the improvement of this river, I request your committee's favorable consideration of a bill I introduced on January 17, 1916, appropriating $1,100,000 for the improvement of this river according to plans prepared and recommended by the United States Government engineers, and approved by a former Secretary of War.

Assuring you of my deep interest in this matter, I am,
Sincerely, yours,
S. TAYLOR NORTH.

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1917.

Hon. S. TAYLOR NORTH,
House of Representatives of the United States.

MY DEAR MR. NORTH: I have yours of the 10th, and note your desire that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors should consider favorably your bill, introduced on January 17, 1916, appropriating $1,100,000 for the improvement of the Allegheny River. Replying I beg to say that the committee will be glad to take this up at any time when we have finished the present bill and shall have gotten it out of the way. Until then it would hardly be practicable for us to consider it unless we were to take it up before action by the War Department has been had on the proposition to raise the bridges over that river at Pittsburgh, which the committee does not desire to do. I note, however, in your letter that favorable action upon that request is anticipated, and as soon as the decision of the Secretary of War in the matter is rendered the committee will be glad to give consideration to your bill, provided, of course, the decision of the Secretary of War is favorable, as you think it will be.

I regard that as a very important project once the obstructions above mentioned are removed.

With assurances of regard, I am,
Yours, very truly,
S. M. SPARKMAN, Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Delaware River, Pa., N. J., and Del.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance from Allegheny Avenue, Philadelphia, to the sea, $1,870,000; for maintenance of improvement from Allegheny Avenue, Philadelphia, to Lalor Street, Trenton, $40,000; completing improvement above Lalor Street, Trenton, $90,000; and for completing improvement at Camden, N. J., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1120, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $71,080; in all, $2,071,080.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Some of the matters inserted here are wasteful, but that is a matter of individual judgment, as has been suggested. I have not mentioned all of those that seem to warrant that appellation. I do not believe the Delaware River project is wasteful. I believe it is a necessary project. Of course, we all agree that Congress should see that the navigation of the country is carried out and that commerce is properly cared for. I think, however, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] should be equally generous, and when I move to strike out $800,000 on the upper Mississippi project, in all fairness he should move to strike out $870,000 from the Delaware River project, because, although there is great commerce there—while there is very little in the upper Mississippi—still, due to the condition of the Treasury, I think that would be a commendable sacrifice upon his part that would be greatly appreciated. I am not going to urge it, but I do say this, that $450,000 of the money used last year on that river was for a dredging company over in Baltimore—the Maryland Dredging Co.—which received 14.7 cents per square yard for work there and 24.9 cents on another contract, while other companies that had contracts there received approximately only 9 cents for dredging. I do not ask these questions for the purpose of puzzling anyone, and I do not suppose the chairman can tell why one company, the Baltimore company, which seems to have had practically an exclusive contract on many of the projects in this part of the country, should charge over twice as much as the other company working on the same project. I do not suppose the gentleman from Philadelphia knows, either.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I can say this to the gentleman: The report shows that there was a controversy over one of these contracts, and it is set forth in the report of the engineer in charge of the Philadelphia district. The contractor failed to do his work and litigation has ensued. I think the matter is now in the Court of Claims. It is one of those things that might happen on any river. Apparently it was because the contractor bit off more than he could chew.

Mr. FREAR. Well, that is the amount, as I said before, this Baltimore concern is getting, over double what the other is getting. It seems to me it is an unreasonable amount, but I am not going to move to strike it out. There was $325,000 of Government dredging on that; $1,045,000, or three times the amount approximately, was for contract dredging. Office engineer's expenses were $225,000 on this one contract last year. On hand they had $2,234,000 and this bill carries $2,020,000 more. On the Delaware River below there was $5,690 used last year and $1,768, or one-third, was for office expenses. The Delaware River at Trenton there is $90,000 asked for now. Office expenses last year were $5,637. Let me suggest this, Mr. Chairman, on that project the Government is engaged in at Trenton, at the rate of $21.50 per square yard, it is right up in front of the village of Trenton. I am not going to move to strike out these items, because I realize the Delaware River is an important project, but it would seem to me that there is no necessity here pressing these very large appropriations at this time for a case like that where there is no commerce at all; that is, on the last project; there is none at Trenton. However, that is all I care to say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman made a motion?

Mr. FREAR. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not think it necessary to take up the time of the committee to discuss this matter of the Delaware River. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has conceded it is a great river, and I think if I had the time I could convince the committee that it is the greatest commercial river in the United States. Of course, it costs something to maintain it and it costs something for office expenses. I assume that is due to the fact that a number of men are employed in a big way and that conditions which would apply at Goose Creek would not apply to the Delaware River. Hence there must be a proportionate increase in expenses. I hope that will answer the gentleman from Wisconsin as to that.

Now, when it comes to that spirit of comity that ought to exist between the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself, with respect to my following him when he moved to strike out an item on the Mississippi, and his following me, should I move to strike out an item for the Delaware, I have to say this, that I have come to understand that the Members of this House have rights on this floor, and that every man comes here from a constituency that charges him with representing it the best he can. I defend the Delaware River to the best of my ability. I ask for it, and so do my colleagues from Pennsylvania, that which we think it deserves. I do not feel that I have the right to invade the district of the gentleman from Wisconsin or to set up claims for a river there or to set up opposition to it after it has been approved by the committee and the engineers. I believe I ought to concede something to the integrity of the gentleman from Wisconsin as a representative of the people who send him here. I believe in the matter of Mud Creek, in Kentucky, or Goose Creek, in Wisconsin, or elsewhere, that if its claims are fairly presented to the committee and the committee, acting upon the report of the United States Army Engineers, brings in a favorable report that I am in a manner estopped from interfering with the prerogatives and preserves of my colleague, unless it is clear that the transaction is unwarranted. Under ordinary circumstances I should not deny him that right of representing his people, which I ask and demand as a right for my own. [Applause.] Now, the gentleman has indicated that there is no business on the upper Delaware at Trenton. That particular portion of the project is carrying a 12-foot depth through rock, from Lalor Street to the wharves in Trenton. There is no large traffic there because the work of improvement is unfinished. But on the upper Delaware to Lalor Street steamships are coming back and forth from Philadelphia to 1 or 2 miles below the city of Trenton, at a reduced cost of transportation and to the great relief of merchants and railroads as well. The Government has not completed the 12-foot depth to the city itself. That is what the people are waiting for. The channel has been carried only to within a mile or two of the city, and in front of the city the engineers have encountered rock, and, of course, there is no commerce there where blasting has been going on.

When the way is clear, then the vessels will go on to Trenton; then they will come from Trenton; then the business will be done. The very purpose of the improvement, the very reason for the expenditure, is to provide the way for commerce, to blaze the way through the rock, as it were, in order that the greater number of people may be served.

Why, we have been carrying commerce to the mouth of the Raritan Canal on the upper Delaware, and we have been using that old waterway to New York. The congestion upon the railroads and the heavy freight rates did it. The inability to make speedy shipments because the rail companies have not the cars to carry the freight. This is why such improvements are needed. They will afford the people at least a measure of relief. The gentleman from Wisconsin would not stop the course of progress, even though he is endeavoring to uphold the banner of economy in this House. And I trust, though he has made no amendment, this paragraph will stand just as it has been written.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I understood the gentleman was not going to make a motion to strike out $800,000?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Strike out $800,000 of the item for the Delaware River? Of course not. I have been pleading with the gentleman from Wisconsin, and he realizes the plea is just; I have been pleading with others to hasten appropriations for the Delaware, so that this great work can be finished and these eternal delays involving great waste shall cease. Finish up the job, and we will secure real economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of the Delaware River.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, an objector to practically every item in an omnibus bill serves a very good purpose indeed, for he calls to the attention of the country the character of the items carried in the measure, and I am sure the individual sponsors for these items welcome the opportunity of rising in their places to defend them.

It is quite an easy matter to stand off and criticize this rivers and harbors bill, and it has grown to be the fashion to do so, to dub it the "pork barrel," and to seek to bring discredit upon Members introducing the bills and upon the splendid committee who thrash them out, assemble them, and bring them into this House.

Now, there is never a single item reported that is not fully explained by the various experts who have investigated it, and these explanations are set forth in printed reports, accessible to all Members who desire information concerning them. One might almost believe, from the charges brought by critics of this measure, who spring up from time to time and flourish temporarily in the limelight, that all a Member of Congress has to do is to whisper to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that he desires an appropriation for a river or rivers in his district, and, presto, out rolls the money. As a matter of fact, there is no legislation so well safeguarded as that for river and harbor improvement. First and foremost, a petition for this assistance must come from responsible people of a location, and they must show conclusively the soundness of their claim for Federal help; their claim and prayers must be presented to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors by the Member introducing the bill, and, provided the necessities of a sufficiently large number of residents seem to warrant an investigation, the committee reports favorably a preliminary survey. The Congress then authorizes and directs the War Department to make the survey, and engineers and experts of the Government proceed with that work. Upon their report, which is submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War, it is decided whether or not an appropriation will be considered for the project. If such report is favorable, a second bill must be introduced proposing that the appropriation be made. Again the whole matter is thrown upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and they consider and weigh the report or reports of the various War Department officials and submit their report to the House. Now, these Army officers have no connection with the Congress—they are not political appointees—and it is inconceivable that they, together with the people asking for the project, the Member who introduces the bill, and the gentlemen of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, are all in collusion and keep the facts out of sight and state conditions which do not exist, for the purpose of wringing money from the Treasury for an unworthy object.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to stand here and support an appropriation for the deepening of the Delaware River in front of the city of Camden, and I invite all who are skeptical, or critical, or enterprising to go up there and look from shore to shore of the Delaware River at that point. The skeptical and critical will be convinced of the absolute worthiness of the project, and the enterprising will be mightily tempted to drive stakes there and seek to improve their opportunities along with the developments that are bound to come to Camden as a great port of this country. She is now a city with a population of nearly 103,000. Her manufacturing establishments number about 350, in which are made almost everything wearable, edible, useful, and luxurious. Nobody asks where Camden is located. Everybody knows, for her fame is abroad. "His Master's Voice" has carried far. The little steel pen found on the desk of almost every business man, in countinghouses, on boudoir desks, and in schools and colleges, proclaims its birthplace. Campbell's soups—"six plates for 10 cents"—the food that has not "gone up," is familiar refreshment all over the civilized world. Many of the greatest battleships of our Navy slid down "the ways" from the New York Shipbuilding Plant in Camden while being christened. Yes; the enterprise and business activities centered in that city on the Delaware have advertised her broadly.

Camden has a water-borne traffic of three and a quarter million tons of freight, valued at nearly $26,000,000, and this traffic will be wonderfully increased when we have a sufficient depth of water to permit deeper draft vessels to land at our wharves. The water front of Philadelphia, just opposite, is almost beyond expansion, and Camden is bound to become to that great metropolis what Jersey City and Brooklyn are to the city of New York. We have a frontage on the Delaware River of 6 miles, plentifully strewn with large business establishments, dealing in lumber, cork, licorice, chalk, soap, metal polish, whiting, Paris green, ranges and heaters, and talking-machine works, and numerous ship building and repair yards. Flowing through the center of the city, in confluence with the Delaware, is the Cooper River, navigable 9 miles, and likewise dotted with numerous and thriving manufacturing establishments.

The industries of Camden, which are widely diversified, include the most important of the country, some of them the largest of their kind. There are machine shops, large foundries, woolen and worsted mills, leather manufactories, shoe factories, chemical works, candy factories, cigar factories, paint and varnish laboratories, and in fact almost every article known to productive industry has its representative establishment in this wide-awake and enterprising city.

Until 1885 the natural channel of the Delaware River was on the Camden side, but in carrying out the Government project for the improvement of the Philadelphia Harbor a dike was built from Fishers Point, on the Jersey shore, to the eastern point of Pettys Island, a distance of 3,500 feet. This dike, with an opening of only 300 feet, was built notwithstanding the protests of Camden interests, and those of the governor of New Jersey, the State legislature, and the riparian commission. The result of the diversion of the water from its natural channel has been shoaling all along the Camden water front, and the relief by the Government of this condition is not only logical but is really only an act of justice long deferred. The necessities for deeper water are great and pressing.

The city, realizing the importance of developing its commerce, has secured the passage of State laws under which the development of its water front may be carried out; bonds may be issued for the acquisition of water-front property and for the building of docks and other harbor facilities. Pettys Island, a part of New Jersey, situated at the upper end of the Philadelphia Harbor, and partly bordering on the upper portion of the proposed 18-foot channel, has recently been purchased by two very large concerns—the Crew-Levick Co. and the Wm. Cramp & Sons Ship and Engine Building Co. Extensive plans for its development have been made, which will involve an outlay of several million dollars. The island will be connected with the main New Jersey shore by a railroad bridge, and thus directly link rail and water transportation at this point. The Crew-Levick Co. has announced that they propose to use this property as their principal export station in this country, and as the company is one of the largest engaged in refining and shipping oil and petroleum products, it means the building up of a large export-trade center. Warehouses, wharves, and docks will be built, and as the channel on the Pennsylvania side of the island is none too wide, it is reasonably certain that these piers will have to be erected on the side facing the New Jersey channel. Vessels going to and from these docks will want to use the east side of the river, and the channel provided for will come none too soon.

Mr. Speaker, I hope and believe that this item will meet with the approval of every Member of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wilmington Harbor, Del.: For maintenance, $50,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to make a statement.

If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is right, I must be wrong; and if so, I want to know it at this time. He says that whenever a Member of Congress comes before this House and presents an item here for his river or for his creek—and the other day he said, "or for his post office"—when a Member of Congress comes here and makes that request, in honor bound, every other Member is obliged to accept his statement and refuse to oppose it. That is the only logical conclusion. I wonder if that is the right course for us to pursue? We are not here, as I understand, representing Philadelphia or Pennsylvania or Wisconsin any more than we are representing the Government Treasury. If I believe that a project is wrong, whether it is a post-office building or whether it is a river and harbor project, or whether it is a private claim that some one is trying to get through, I think it is a duty we owe ourselves and owe to the country to try to expose it and stop it if need be. I know gentlemen on this floor who tell me the pressure is hard and has been hard for individual projects from their home communities.

Well, now, I do not believe in every case that those gentlemen are to be criticized, but I can not understand why I should be criticized and in honor bound compelled to remain silent. According to that standard I have no right to enter a protest here. And yet I know that on the upper Mississippi River the money is wasted. There are other Members who know that river. I made a motion in the committee to cut the appropriation down. But, Mr. Chairman, if that is a right standard I have no business to oppose any of these bills. The gentlemen in the Senate who came within one vote of defeating the bill last time ought to remain mute—with their mouths closed. What right have they if some Member of Congress asks for his project that calls for so much money from the Treasury?

Each one of us has to represent the Government. I do not criticize because our standards may be different from theirs, but unless I can have some further proof that my course is wrong in calling attention to what is unnecessary at this particular time and to this condition of the Treasury I shall continue as best I can to disclose the facts, although I will do so courteously, and I do not want to be put in the attitude of impugning unfair motives to my colleagues. They may defend the projects if they choose, and I have the right to point wasteful projects out as I see them.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I was greatly surprised at the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in attempting to curtail the activities of the distinguished public servant from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who has assumed the responsible duty of regulating and controlling the activities of legislation here, of preventing steals from the Treasury, and preventing the Army engineers of the United States from extravagance and wastefulness and fraud.

And in connection with the engineers, I would like to call attention to what the gentleman said a while ago in speaking of the Delaware River. He referred to dredging contracts and collusion between dredging companies. In his report, the minority report, from which I read, occurs this language:

Specific evidence also has been placed in the RECORD, and resolutions of investigation introduced, concerning dredging companies and their activities with waterway lobbies and secret methods of alloting Government contracts. These resolutions affecting any secret activities of railways, dredging companies, or other interests in connection with waterway bills before Congress are of public importance and should be pressed for consideration by those in either House possessing sufficient influence to ascertain the facts.

And then occurs this language:

Evidence of apparent extravagance or fraud in the present method of letting contracts is offered in this connection.

Now, if that language carries with it any inference whatever, it is that the engineers are guilty of extravagance or fraud or violation of the law in letting contracts for river and harbor work. If that is the only inference that can be drawn from it, I submit that the gentleman from Wisconsin is uttering a statement which he ought to make only with great deliberation when he charges the Army engineers with fraud, with violations of the law, with premeditated and knowing extravagance. But that is the only inference from his language.

Innuendo ought not to be indulged in when gentlemen are maligning the character and reputation and good name of others. If the gentleman intends all that language implies—and I submit it is the only inference that can be drawn from it—then he ought to say so. If he does not intend it, then he ought to retract it.

The Chief of Engineers and the Army engineers need no defense at my hands or at the hands of any Member of this House. Their learning, their skill, their record in the public service, to which in all that record there has been only one charge of fraud or misuse of public money, place them beyond the need of defense. In that case, occurring at Savannah, Ga., there were no more persistent and energetic prosecutors of the officer charged with and proven to have been guilty of fraud than his colleagues, the Army engineers. With that exception, I reiterate the statement that for character and integrity and for efficiency in the public service they stand unchallenged before the American people. The gentleman ought not to impugn their character by innuendo, but, if he means to do so, he ought to do so openly, by language about which there can be no misconstruction or ambiguity. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appoquinimink, Murderkill, and Mispillion Rivers, Del.: For maintenance, $20,000; for improvement of Mispillion River, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 678, Sixty-second Congress, second session, except that part of said improvement known as Cut-off No. 2, which is hereby eliminated from said project, $35,200: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement; in all, $55,200.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. I will agree to a part of what the gentleman [Mr. SMALL] says who has just spoken. However, he rises in defense of the present method of letting contracts. I will submit to anyone that that statement, in view of the facts that were presented in the report and on which I will present further facts in the RECORD, warrants inspection and possibly criticism, not of the Army Engineers necessarily, but of the methods of making contracts, when one company, at an average rate of 26½ cents on its contracts, is enabled to control dredging for a whole district. When I asked the engineer in committee how it came about, he did not know. It looks as if there was a dearth of contractors or of bidders, not that the officers, the Army engineers, are dishonest, or are committing fraud. That is not the suggestion. One company controls many contracts. Down on the James River it has the whole contract, and it has contracts in other places, including a $450,000 contract in the Delaware. Facts concerning such contracts at excessive dredging rates were put into the RECORD before and will be again. In fact, there existed, and probably still exists to-day, an association of dredgers, with an understanding between them to let contracts and fix prices. It is significant, to say the least, and attention should be called to this condition of affairs. That the agreement still exists may be borne out by the fact that only one contractor appears to have been considered in regard to these cases, and all such contracts at a high rate compared with others. That is not a charge against the engineers. They are helpless, as I understand, and they have to take what is offered. There ought to be fair competition. It falls right back on Congress to refuse to make appropriations for private contracts unless genuine competition exists.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. COX. As I recall, last year a provision was placed on the river and harbor bill prohibiting contracts to be let to private parties for dredging at a profit in excess of 25 per cent.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. COX. Did that finally become a law?

Mr. FREAR. That finally became a law.

Mr. COX. How did it work? Was it workable?

Mr. FREAR. No one can tell. That was put in the law because of the project in which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is interested more particularly. As the Army engineer well said, unless you have a Government dredge working by the side of a private dredge, you can not tell the comparative cost. Where the private dredge alone is engaged in doing the excavating, you have no way of determining what the cost of doing the work by the Government should be.

Mr. COX. What is the name of this large dredging concern?

Mr. FREAR. The Maryland Dredging & Contracting Co.

Mr. COX. A corporation?

Mr. FREAR. I assume so. By the way, the head of that company is the same as that in the dredger's statement who allotted contracts for the dredging association, and thereby fixed the price. That notice or agreement was put in the RECORD.

Mr. COX. What is his name?

Mr. FREAR. The name appears in the RECORD as Frank Fuerst. I do not know the gentleman.

Mr. COX. The gentleman says he allotted these dredging contracts?

Mr. FREAR. That was the statement which was put into the RECORD, and I will put it into the RECORD again; the letter in which Fuerst asked members of the dredging association to see to it that Members of Congress were fed at banquets, because it made them good-natured. That was substantially the statement. He further said this matter of allotting contracts had made them a great deal of trouble.

Mr. COX. What Members attended the banquet?

Mr. FREAR. I think I had better read it. I can not state it as well as I can read it.

Mr. COX. That is news to me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a very serious matter. Going to a banquet is a frightful business!

Mr. COX. I do not know whether it is or not. That is news to me.

Mr. FREAR. I thought this might come up, so I brought it along and am indebted to the gentleman from North Carolina for reminding me of these contracts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It came up after the banquet.

Mr. FREAR. I am reading the notice sent out by Mr. Fuerst, who is president of the association, who signs the statement. This was sent to me through New York parties, and it has never been questioned or criticized. I have put it in the RECORD twice already.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will my friend from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. FREAR. If I can get a little more time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not object to these dredging men having a dinner once in a while, does he?

Mr. FREAR. No; many of them, if necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They work hard all day, and they have to go to dinner sometimes.

Mr. FREAR. Let me read further.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was any Member of Congress named as having attended these banquets?

Mr. FREAR. No. They are mentioned generally.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then all Members present are absolved?

Mr. FREAR. We are all included. This is the statement about the allotting of contracts.

Mr. COX. Was that originally published in a newspaper, or how did the gentleman get it?

Mr. FREAR. No; it was sent to me by gentlemen from New York.

Mr. COX. Did it come through the mail?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; that particular one did, but I have since had the source explained and feel confident it is absolutely reliable.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know how many concerns in the United States have heretofore been engaged in the operation of dredging?

Mr. FREAR. No. This is on the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. COX. How many are engaged there?

Mr. FREAR. I would not be able to state. There are several in Philadelphia and others both north and south; many concerns, I assume, from Boston down to Florida.

Mr. COX. Are they all members of this one association?

Mr. FREAR. I can not speak for a certainty as to that. The gentleman will find when he examines what I put in the RECORD the dredgers and other people who have contributed to the river and harbor congress, and their names will show and the assumption can be made whether they are members of the dredging association. I can not say as to that. We can find upon the investigation provided for in a resolution which I offer again to-day, by calling these people before us whether they are allotting contracts to-day.

Mr. COX. If I understand the gentleman aright, there are several concerns engaged in dredging, and the attempt has been made to get them all together and combine.

Mr. FREAR. I assume so.

Mr. COX. For the purpose of allotting contracts, each getting his share, and serious complaint has been made that the banquets have not been well attended.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I want to say that I never received an invitation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether there are enough private dredges in the United States to do work that the Government desires done?

Mr. FREAR. I am afraid not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it possible that a combination of all the dredges when there are not sufficient dredges that they could in any way seriously interfere with Government work?

Mr. FREAR. The obvious answer is that under present conditions the cost will be far in excess of reasonable remuneration, because they can get all the work they want under present conditions without limit to price, and they assume control of the entire district. This one combination charges on many projects 26½ cents, whereas on a single project in the same district one other concern charges 9 cents.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Perhaps one has to go through rock and the other through sand.

Mr. FREAR. No; I want to correct the gentleman on that, because the report says that it is mud and sand in all these Baltimore district projects mentioned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I assume that there would be an entirely different charge in dredging sand in the St. John and rock in the Hudson River. Now, I assume that if there were no dredges or drills in the vicinity of the Hudson River—private concerns in which I have no interest whatever, that would unquestionably do the work in the Hudson River—it would be necessary for the engineers to ask people of some other sections of the country for prices to do that work. As a matter of fact, the Government has had to build some dredges to do certain work, because there were no private dredges.

Mr. FREAR. This dredging at 26½ cents per yard is for mud and sand.

I submit herewith a statement, as promised, and from which I have read, which shows other matters of vital interest concerning river and harbor legislation and contracts that require investigating.

Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire to offer testimony tending to show—

First. That whatever may be the judgment of the Federal Congress, a powerful waterway lobby, whose president is a leading legislator, insists in its official report that waterway appropriations throughout the country are allotted geographically, due to the power of such lobby over Congress.

Second. That in the letting of contracts for Government dredging throughout the country an organization of dredgers insists it has allotted private dredging contracts among dredgers, and necessarily, through lack of competition, has held up the Government for excessive charges to meet its demands.

Third. That this dredgers' organization, which includes dredgers along the eastern seaboard, in past years has been a strong contributor to the support of the same waterway lobby that claimed to control the making up of waterway bills.

Fourth. That the head of the dredgers' association annually receives Government contracts aggregating upward of a million dollars, and at prices that indicate no genuine competition to-day exists among dredgers.

Fifth. That the Board of Engineers, under present methods, through its recommendations to Congress practically determines the necessities of different waterways where public money is to be expended on old projects and Congress determines what new projects are to be adopted.

Sixth. That if the lobby determines the geographical allotment of waterway appropriations throughout the country, it must exercise some potent influence in the distribution of appropriations for old projects and over Congress itself in the allotment of new contracts.

Believing that these claims are so serious in character that they merit immediate consideration, I offer first evidence submitted in its official report wherein the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, a waterway lobby, claims to control the allotment of Government appropriations geographically in proportion to contributions received by that lobby.

PROJECTS DISTRIBUTED ACCORDING TO CONTRIBUTIONS.

By paying 1 per cent of Federal appropriations to the support of the River and Harbors Congress every community can feel it has the supporting arm of this second congress. On pages 60 to 62 of the 1911 report appears a list of appropriations given to the different States of the Union amounting, in all, to $178,616,897 from 1907 to 1911, inclusive.

In two columns the members of the "second congress" are impressed with the relation between that body and the amount of Government appropriations for each separate State. I quote literally from the listed method of comparison and cite a dozen States or more to show the proportionate grabs that are held out invitingly to gaze by the Rivers and Harbors Congress officials.

	Amounts subscribed to the support of National Rivers and Harbors Congress, by States, 1906-1911, inclusive.	Amount of appropriations received by States, in rivers and harbors bill, 1907-1911, inclusive.
Pennsylvania (east)	$4,295	$4,837,745
Connecticut	2,115	2,318,000
Massachusetts	2,850	1,451,733
Maryland	1,755	2,778,265
New Jersey	2,735	3,484,895
North Carolina	2,538	2,259,614
South Carolina	1,137	1,237,290
Virginia	4,306	4,082,454
Georgia	8,281	4,102,889
Florida	1,620	5,188,670
District of Columbia	1,530	1,243,000
Alabama	6,090	6,952,000
Louisiana	9,505	3,820,292
Texas	8,825	9,193,309
Mississippi River		21,842,775

Mississippi River (1914), $10,500,000, or nearly one-half of the six years' total.

DISTRIBUTING THE PORK.

New York and Florida receive more than the average State, excepting that the Mississippi River lump sum would swell the adjacent States over $21,000,000, if counted.

Doubtless it appeals to lay members to realize that by the investment of $1 in the "second congress" $100 will be forthcoming from the Federal Congress. It is in harmony with the views of Secretary Ellison and of the purposes set forth so eloquently by the constitution.

To become entitled to generous Federal appropriations as a harvest for a 1 per cent investment, the following rates for annual dues are provided for membership in the "National Rivers and Harbors Congress of the United States," as it is styled by its officers:

	Annual dues.
Individuals	$5
Firms or corporations	10
Organizations of less than 400	25
Organizations over 400 and less than 600	50
Organizations of 600 to 1,000	75
Organizations of 1,000 or more	100
Waterway associations	100

In addition to its claim of controlling appropriations according to local contributions to the lobby, I give a further testimonial as to its aims and standards.

SECRETARY ELLISON'S LEGISLATIVE STANDARDS.

A speech by an officer of this second congress, delivered on the same occasion, is of special interest. Capt. Ellison, a former secretary and treasurer of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, has given the Members of the Federal Congress a new freedom of action, governed only by ability to get each one's share of loot. It is a novel amendment to the oath of office to which Congressmen subscribe. Mr. Ellison said in his annual speech:

I want to repeat and to emphasize that in supporting the National Rivers and Harbors Congress you are supporting your own cause. * * * Mark you, it is not my intention to criticize either Congress or Congressmen for lack of business methods, for I truly believe the average man who comes to Washington is just as good a business man as the average man he has left at home. It is not his fault, as I see it, but our fault, and I use the word "our" in a nation-wide sense. We send him here to legislate for the Nation theoretically, but actually to get all he can for us; and if he does not get our share, and then some, we do our best to replace him with some other man, who will take better care of our particular congressional district.

That report from which I have cited is not sent broadcast by an irresponsible lobby. That lobby maintains quarters in this city throughout the year. About a month ago it gathered together hundreds of waterway enthusiasts from all over the country with its shibboleth, "a $50,000,000 annual governmental appropriation for a policy, not a project." At that meeting it was addressed by the Vice President of this country, who recommended that the present system of omnibus-bill legislation be stopped. At that meeting it was addressed by the present Chief of Engineers, who determines locality of waterway improvements and amounts needed. At that meeting it was addressed by an ex-Chief of Engineers, who stated that waterway appropriations never exceeded one-half of 1 per cent pork. From the foregoing it will be observed that this lobby is, or believes itself to be, all powerful, and that it is directly and openly supported and directed by leading legislators and administrative officers of this present administration.

HOW THE DREDGERS ALLOT CONTRACTS.

I submit a statement secretly issued by a dredgers' organization and placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a speech made September 29, 1914. It shows the methods and power exercised by that organization over Government dredging contracts aggregating many millions of dollars annually.

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE ATLANTIC AND GULF COAST DREDGE OWNERS' ASSOCIATION, MARCH 13, 1901.

To the Atlantic and Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association.

GENTLEMEN: In accordance with the constitution, rules, and by-laws of this association, your board of directors, through your president, present for your consideration herewith their report for the year ending February 13, 1901, adding thereto such recommendations and suggestions as your board have considered during the past year.

The year just closing, the eighteenth year of the association, and the years since its organization have been marked by constant and faithful effort to promote, through the means of general work and enterprise, everything that will make for the good of every operator enrolled in its membership. Measures have been constantly brought to your attention and every effort made to uplift our business and protect it in all proper and legitimate channels.

These efforts have been more or less successful, but always along the line of an earnest endeavor to conserve the real interests of our business.

During the past year your board have especially taken up for consideration the question of its department for fixing prices on work and the allotment of work through the commissioners of that department and have carefully studied the problems which present themselves in connection with that line of work.

The department in question was not originally contemplated by the founders of this association, nor was it intended as any part of the work for which the association was formed.

The organization had its origin in the recognized desire of many operators in the dredging business for effective cooperation in many important fields of work, where the general interests of their business had long been neglected. It was felt by the progressive men who had invested large amounts of capital in this business that an organization of operators could be effected by the Atlantic coast whose duty and object would be the closer affiliation of operators and the combination of the talent and energy in the business for the promotion by all lawful means for the advancement of their business, and to present a united front, supported by united resources, to meet and overcome any and all obstacles then existing or thereafter appearing.

IN UNION THERE IS STRENGTH.

It was the old and tried principle, to wit, "In union there is strength" and "A house divided against itself falls," and the keynote of all successful organizations must be that very same principle. Following this rule, the effort of this association should have been confined entirely to meeting and overcoming obstacles which come from without—fighting the common enemy, so to speak. This would mean the promotion of all measures for urging public bodies to undertake public improvements in submarine work, compelling the enactment of reasonable laws governing our work, and the repeal of obnoxious and vexatious laws; experiments in all branches of machinery and devices used in our business, and a general department for furnishing to each member information desired by him regarding any particular work, or concerning which other members may have knowledge, giving in every way to each member the fullest possible data regarding dredging operations on the coast and the history of each piece of work.

So many measures of general interest and value are included in the work that could be successfully performed by an association to the advantage of its members, and so much can be done in the way of promoting good fellowship amongst them by means of this organization, and also by entertaining prominent and influential men at its banquets and through special committees, that enumeration here of all these different and important measures is unnecessary.

Any thoughtful man who is engaged in our business can readily see how important it is that an efficient organization of operators should be maintained to promote measures of general interest and value.

QUARRELING OVER SPOILS.

Some years after the organization was effected an element entered into its work which has almost crowded out all features of general work and has practically turned the association, which was originally formed for general benefits only, into a special organization for the distribution of work and apportionment of contracts. Starting, as it did, in the desire to combine against outsiders, it has ended in combining against itself; and instead of its members standing together to promote the business of dredging in all its general and important details, as above mentioned, we behold a spectacle of members quarreling one with another over the division of work, and each one complaining that the association is a failure because it does not give to each one all the work that he feels is his due, each member forgetting that the association simply undertook this duty because it was forced upon it, and because other agencies to do that work had failed, and because the operators on the Atlantic coast refused to enter into proper arrangements for dividing work amongst them and preferred to load this work upon the association, a work for which the latter was unfitted, for which it was never intended or formed, and the only excuse for foisting this measure upon it was apparently the dredging operators failed to appreciate that this kind of work was done in other lines of business by special pools organized for no other purpose and specially organized for that purpose alone.

It is time that all thoughtful men in this association pause and consider whether the association is to blame for failing to perform a task entirely beyond its powers or resources, and also whether it would be well for the association to reject this burden and relegate it to proper agencies and take up the duties for which it was organized.

We think it is time that this be done and this bone of contention removed from the midst of our association and the members once more united and working along the lines of common interest. Little of the real value of this association has been demonstrated or developed of recent years and much disagreement and bitterness has come between the members in that time, and all because the association has neglected its real duties and buried itself with false ones. The former would bind its members more firmly together, whereas the latter simply disintegrates our ranks.

It is certainly time that this "Jonah" be thrown overboard and left to the tender mercies of some sufficient "whale" or "pool" and the association be permitted to again bend to its task and resume its long interrupted voyage.

In presenting these views to the members your board feel that they are simply pointing out the pitfall into which this association has become entangled, and which has retarded its growth and usefulness for some years and has brought upon it an immense amount of work foreign to its proper duties. Much of the dissatisfaction has been due to this very cause, and members have been alienated whose assistance was of the greatest value to us. We have seen the camel crowd into our tent and force out everything else, and it is time that this fruitless and thankless task, which was put upon the association, be now put off and the department created for the allotment and apportionment of dredging work and contracts be abandoned and all rules pertaining thereto be repealed.

The association should, on the other hand, favor the creation of pools in each district formed upon the lines of other successful business arrangements of like character.

The association as a whole will then confine itself to legitimate business of acquiring work and promoting the resources of members for doing work, leaving to the separate pools the business of dividing up that work at good prices.

TO THROW ALL RESOURCES ON PROJECTS.

We count in this association the membership and influence of every man engaged in the business; each one has something of value to us in the way of ideas, talent, energy, or influence, and it is the work of the association and its proper object and function to use these various factors for the benefit of the whole membership, and to throw upon any desired point the full resources of the association. In this way and by turning its steps in the right direction and with the full confidence and cooperation which it would then have from all its members, there no longer being any grounds for contention or rivalry amongst one another, when once this department of allotment was abandoned, the association will once more resume its proper place and perform many duties of the highest use and importance to its members.

The cost of its work would be distributed, and no member would have any cause for regretting that he was enrolled in its ranks.

If these views meet with your approval, your board would earnestly urge that, at least for a time, the district commission and all rules pertaining thereto be abrogated and discontinued; that the board of directors be instructed to arrange and appoint a series of committees, chosen of their own ranks, as well as from the entire membership, giving to each committee certain specified duties, which will include all matters which it is to the interest of the association to have promoted and studied. These committees should report from time to time to the board of directors, and the latter, being a representative body from all parts of the coast, would be most efficient in taking up and promoting all suggestions and measures requiring action.

No expense should be incurred by the committees, except as specially authorized by the directors from time to time and in cases where the necessity for such expenditures is apparent.

The board should organize a bureau of information, which would furnish to each member at regular intervals a synopsis of what is going on in the way of dredging operations on the coast, improvements in machinery or methods of doing work, with descriptions of such improvements, locations, etc., and the general work being done by and through committees and in the board of directors; this and such other additional information as may suggest itself.

This bureau should be in charge of a competent man, whose business is to procure and intelligently transmit matters of interest.

The question of insurance has never been adequately considered, and some measure should be taken up and carefully considered, so that a general scheme of insurance could be devised to secure some reduction of the large premium now paid by members to the insurance companies. Very little, if any, work of this kind has been done in our business, and it is believed that a system of employment of representative agents for our insurance would be found profitable and a great saving.

DREDGERS NEGLECTED THE PORK BARREL.

The lack of association methods and the failure to use the means in our hands for the general good was forcibly illustrated recently in the river and harbor bill, where absolutely no effort was made by the association to procure any amendment to the bill or any provision inserted therein for its benefit.

It also appears in the case recently of certain collisions which occurred in the Savannah River, where the law at present provides that a dredge occupying a channel in navigable waters is doing so at its peril, and no damages resulting to the said dredge can be recovered. These and a great many instances could be cited to show the neglect that general interest of dredging men is receiving at this time and emphasizes the necessity for proper action by the association, to wit, such as this one was intended to be and should be.

Your board of directors desire to assure this association and its members that they have devoted their best efforts during the year just ended to a consideration of all matters affecting the interests and business of those for whom they have acted. They have appreciated that the duties which they assumed in accepting the offices of directors required them to give the necessary time to consideration of the matters intrusted to them, and they looked over the entire field of cooperative work, and have determined that the association could be made of great value to the members if conducted on the lines heretofore specified.

They are also of the opinion that the work which the association has been attempting to do, namely, the allotment of work among members, has been entirely contrary to the spirit of this organization, and has proven a stumbling block in all its efforts to promote the general interests of its members. We feel that by means of thorough reforms in our methods, such as has been outlined, that the organization will rapidly add to its membership, and soon include all the operators on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts; that there will no longer be any reason why anyone engaged in the business should not join with us in our efforts to promote the business and encourage the giving of work by those having it in their power to do so, as well as the many other features which have been touched upon in this our report.

The board have held meetings on the second Wednesday of every month except the months of July and August, during which latter months the constitution provides a recess shall be taken, and the meetings have been well attended.

BOARD IS TO WORK FOR PORK BARRELS.

Your board feels regret that the river and harbor bill has failed of passage, and considers it all the more important that the association should be organized for the purpose of adding its influence to urging work by municipal organizations and bodies and doing all in their power to create offerings of work in the various ports of entry and harbors. It is only by persistent effort that the loss entailed upon us by the failure of the harbor bill can in any way be compensated for. Your board further wishes to emphasize their regret that the annual banquet of the association has been allowed to go by default for two or three years. These entertainments do not entail any serious expense upon the association, but they do create the greatest possible prestige for our business in the estimation of those whose favor it is to our advantage to gain. Influential public men and men of business affairs having to do with transportation companies and steamship lines are entertained by us on these occasions with the greatest possible benefit to our business—municipal officers, heads of departments, Members of Congress and of legislatures—and their favor and interest is legitimately gained and has been found to be of the greatest value when circumstances required it. The expense of our entertainment is wisely expended and brings an adequate return for every dollar so spent.

We might also add that the occasion also affords an opportunity for members to meet on holiday terms and encourages in every way good fellowship and kindly feelings among them. It is therefore to be hoped that in another year this banquet will be again a feature of the association.

The work of the association has been so largely confined to the burdensome details of allotment and district commission work during the past year that very little of general interest has developed.

We have done the best we could with the allotment problem and have done even better than an association of this kind could have been expected to do; but we hope that the whole matter will be relegated to other agencies and the efforts of this association left untrammeled for the coming year to perform the duties for which it is properly fitted.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Dated New York, March 13, 1901.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
By FRANK A. FUERST, President.

THE LOBBY AND THE DREDGERS.

The following data, also presented in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in speech of September 29, 1914, links up the two organizations that profess to control allotments of appropriations and contracts:

[National Rivers and Harbors Congress: JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, president, Washington, D. C., and Lake Providence, La.; J. F. Ellison, secretary and treasurer, Cincinnati, Ohio; John A. Fox, special director, Washington, D. C.]

WASHINGTON OFFICE, 1910.

To the business interests of Baltimore, Md.:

The National Rivers and Harbors Congress is working earnestly to secure the adoption by the Federal Government of a permanent waterway policy that will provide for improving all the worthy waterways of the Union.

The improvement of the canals and waters of the Atlantic coast, in which Baltimore has such a direct and vital interest, should be among the first to receive the benefit of the increased and regular appropriations for rivers and harbors that this organization is working to bring about.

Funds are needed to carry on the work which the National Rivers and Harbors Congress has persistently urged, and to the end that a strong demand may come from every section of the Republic we earnestly invite your financial cooperation.

John M. Williams is authorized to receive and receipt for all moneys that may be subscribed. He is working under the direction of and reporting to the undersigned officers of the congress.

Very respectfully,

JOS. E. RANSDELL,
President.

P. S.—We earnestly urge the people of Baltimore to contribute to the support of this great work.

DAVID H. CARROLL,
Vice President.
JOHN R. SHERWOOD,
Director.

The Dredge Owners' Protective Organization assists. Witness the following:

Another matter of importance is developed by the Chief of Engineers' 1916 report which invites attention:

[From the minority report on the 1917 pending river and harbor appropriation bill, p. 13.]

DREDGING CONTRACTS AND ALLOTMENTS.

Specific evidence also has been placed in the RECORD, and resolutions of investigation introduced, concerning dredging companies and their activities with waterway lobbies and secret methods of alloting Government contracts. These resolutions affecting any secret activities of railways, dredging companies, or other interests in connection with waterway bills before Congress are of public importance and should be pressed for consideration by those in either House possessing sufficient influence to ascertain the facts.

Evidence of apparent extravagance or fraud in the present method of letting contracts is offered in this connection. On October 8, 1914, this minority member of the committee placed before the House what purported to be a copy of a secret agreement among dredgers, wherein it appeared that a dredging board representing the various dredgers was engaged in fixing prices on Government contracts and allotting work to the members of the association, together with contributions and active lobbying to secure the passage of omnibus waterway bills.

Last session of the Sixty-fourth Congress the river and harbor bill carried a provision attempting to prevent excessive profits by private dredgers working for the Government. An examination of the Chief of Engineers' Report for 1916 shows that one particular dredging company was awarded all contracts on many different projects in the Baltimore district at one fixed price of 26½ cents per yard. One project alone was excepted, and in that one contract let to another dredging company the contract rate for dredging apparently the same kind of material, sand and mud, was let at 7.9 cents per yard, or less than one-third of the favored company's many contracts (pp. 2109 to 2136. Report 1916).

No comparative Government cost is offered and no Government plant operated in the district.

Other contracts let to this same first-mentioned company on the Delaware River aggregated approximately $450,000, according to the 1916 report, and were let at rates of 14.7 and 24.9 cents per yard, respectively, whereas three other contracts with two other companies on the Delaware project averaged about 9 cents per yard.

By a coincidence the same first-mentioned company has an exclusive contract on the James River, reaching 57 cents per yard for ordinary dredging, $9.30 per yard for hard rock, and 17 cents per cubic foot for removing snags and stumps from a stream that was recommended for discontinuance by engineers, but was put in the bill by Congress over that protest. Did the dredging company influence that result? Why is the Government paying $9.30 per yard for navigation on the James?

Another contract at Baltimore Harbor at a lower dredging rate, held by this same company, is one of numerous exclusive contracts which are at least open to inquiry when it is understood that this company, possessing so many exclusive Government contracts, some at questionably high prices, has for its president the same gentleman whose name purports to have been signed as president of the board of directors of the Atlantic and Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association, which association in past years secretly allotted Government contracts to its various members.

WHAT GOVERNMENT DREDGING COSTS.

On page 2212 of the 1916 report it appears that Government dredging on one project cost just 4.13 cents per cubic yard. Another project, page 2214, cost the Government 7.8 cents per yard, and still two others, pages 2216 and 2219, cost just 7 cents per yard. No attempt has been made to secure a thorough investigation of Government dredging contracts, but it is submitted that under the circumstances all the facts should be known, and to that end I have offered a resolution which speaks for itself:

Resolution.

Whereas the Government has appropriated $898,543,252 for river and harbor improvements, including over $240,000,000 for the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers, the larger part of which first-named enormous amount has been wasted and frittered away on extravagant, useless, and deserted waterways; and

Whereas the pending river and harbor bill carries approximately $38,000,000 for river and harbor improvements in addition to nearly $43,000,000 appropriated for the same purposes during this same session of the Sixty-fourth Congress; and

Whereas the pending river and harbor bill covers dribbling appropriations for the beginning of 80 new waterway projects in addition to $29,000,000 contained in said bill for the maintenance or improvement of good, questionable, and useless old projects; and

Whereas the business judgment of Army engineers to properly determine the commercial value of thousands of projects heretofore approved by them has been open to criticism because of approval given to such governmental expenditures as the Norfolk and Beaufort $5,400,000 canal waterway, the Chesapeake and Delaware $8,000,000 project, the Cumberland River $11,000,000 canalization project, the Black Warrior River $12,000,000 canalization project, the Tennessee River $17,000,000 canalization project, the Muscle Shoals Tennessee River $18,700,000 waterpower and navigation project, the lower Missouri new $20,000,000 navigation and reclamation project, the upper Mississippi $28,000,000 navigation project, and the lower Mississippi navigation and reclamation project, which may exceed $500,000,000, and also including scores of smaller wasteful waterway projects, such as the Trinity River and Brazos River, Arkansas River, Ouachita River, and Red River, each of which has received from the Government between $2,000,000 and $4,000,000 for practically useless and deserted waterways; and

Whereas another source of waste and extravagance in connection with Governmental waterway expenditures consists in the apparent lack of genuine competitive bids among private dredging companies doing business for the Government, which fact appears from contracts executed during the last year according to the Army engineers' report, and which is further indicated by secret understandings, agreements, and allotments of contracts; and

Whereas it is alleged that the dredgers of the country have in past years, through their official organization, sought to actively and secretly influence the passage of river and harbor legislation, as appears from the following extract, quoted from an alleged report of the board of directors of the Atlantic and Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association, issued after the defeat of a former river and harbor bill, which extract from the signed report reads as follows:

"We count in this association the membership and influence of every man engaged in the business; each one has something of value to us in the way of ideas, talent, energy, or influence, and it is the work of the association and its proper object and function to use these various factors for the benefit of the whole membership and to throw upon any desired point the full resources of the association. In this way, and by turning its steps in the right direction, and with full confidence and cooperation which it would then have from all its members, there would no longer be any grounds for contention or rivalry amongst one another. When once this department of allotment is abandoned the association will once more resume its proper place and perform many duties of the highest use and importance to its members." (An apparent admission that all contracts are or were controlled by the board of directors and subsequently allotted to the different members by a dredging trust)"; and

Whereas the directors' report further states:

"The board should organize a bureau of information, which would furnish to each member at regular intervals a synopsis of what is going on in the way of dredging operations on the coast, improvements in machinery or in methods of doing work, with descriptions of such improvements, locations, etc., and the general work being done by and through committees and in the board of directors—this and such other additional information as may suggest itself.

"The lack of association methods and the failure to use the means in our hands for the general good was forcibly illustrated recently in the river and harbor bill, where absolutely no effort was made by the association to procure any amendment to the bill or any provision inserted therein for its benefit"; and

Whereas the directors' report states:

"Your board feels regret that the river and harbor bill has failed of passage and considers it all the more important that the association should be organized for the purpose of adding its influence to urging work by municipal organizations and bodies, and doing all in their power to create offerings of work in the various ports of entry and harbors. It is only by persistent effort that the loss entailed upon us by the failure of the harbor bill can in any way be compensated for"; and

Whereas such report further states that Members of Congress and legislators have been banqueted and filled with viands solid and liquid to influence their judgment, as follows:

"Your board further wishes to emphasize their regret that the annual banquet of the association has been allowed to go by default for the last two or three years. These entertainments do not entail any serious expense upon the association, but they do create the greatest possible prestige for our business in the estimation of those whose favor it is to our advantage to gain. Influential business men and men of public affairs having to do with transportation companies and steamship lines are entertained by us on these occasions with the greatest possible benefit to our business—municipal officers, heads of departments, Members of Congress, and legislatures—and their favor and interest is legitimately gained and has been found to be of the greatest value when circumstances require it. The expense of our entertainment is wisely expended and brings an adequate return for every dollar so spent"; and

Whereas it is alleged that such dredgers have subscribed to the support of waterway lobbies engaged in securing the passage of river and harbor bills, and it is reasonable to believe from such statements that said dredgers' association is secretly and actively aiding in the allotment and control of Government dredging contracts, as suggested in such report; and

Whereas Col. C. McD. Townsend, president of the Mississippi River Commission caused to be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 11, 1915, a carefully considered address, wherein he said:

"* * * Specifically, the writer would not abandon any navigable stream in the Mississippi Valley that has been partially improved, but would leave 58 of them in their statu quo, confining operations to snagging and the maintenance of existing works, and would concentrate appropriations on opening up a channel of the capacity of that existing on the lower and middle Mississippi to Chicago and Pittsburgh. * * * If the facilities thus afforded by the Government are utilized, the upper Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers should then receive attention"; and

Whereas we are asked to halt "improvements" on 58 river projects by Col. Townsend; and

Whereas no more impressive warning can be found on this same subject than in the minority report of the Sixty-third Congress by Senator Burton (S. Rept. 599, pt. 2), wherein he says, page 11:

"The waste which has been incurred in the canalization of rivers by the expensive system of locks and dams has been even worse than in improvement of open-channel rivers, the navigation of which has dwindled to such small proportions": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the House investigate and report back to the House at the beginning of the next session what waterways in its judgment deserve continued appropriations and what other waterways should be abandoned or allowed to remain in statu quo pending one or more experiments in waterway improvements, by them to be designated, and which are now being conducted at Government expense by Army engineers; and the committee is hereby authorized to call before it such witnesses as it sees fit in order to arrive at its decision.

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be further instructed to bring before it the officers and board of directors of the Atlantic and Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association, and such other parties as may be deemed advisable, and ascertain what efforts have been exerted toward securing the passage of the rivers and harbors bills in past years, its methods of allotments of contracts, and what connection, if any, such organization or the membership thereof have with the remarkable secret back fire urged in Congress in behalf of all such bills.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20079, the river and harbor bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

NAVY YARD COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. One day last week the President sent a message to the House with the report of the Navy Yard Commission. The Chair, not knowing that there were any illustrations, ordered the message and accompanying papers to be printed. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs informs the Chair that it is necessary to have the illustrations printed, and, without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following leaves of absence were granted:

To Mr. GALLIVAN, for three days, on account of death in the family.

To Mr. LITTLEPAGE, for two days, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SILENT PICKETING.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read from the Speaker's desk a telegram received from the chairman of the State committee of the National Woman's Party of Colorado in regard to picketing the White House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., January 19, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Press report to-day quotes Congressman EMERSON as protesting in House against silent picketing by Congressional Union. State committee of National Woman's Party of Colorado upholds silent picketing by Congressional Union as necessary protest against undemocratic blocking of Federal suffrage amendment by President and party in power. Please have this protest read into CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

BERTHA W. FOWLER, State Chairman.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, 10 days ago I was permitted to insert in the RECORD a peace document. I ask unanimous consent to insert four other documents, bringing the peace effort up to to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 23, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the President of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation made by the District of Columbia appropriation act of September 1, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 1970); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation for post allowances to diplomatic and consular officers in China, including Hongkong, for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1971); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for the relief of certain civilian employees of the Ordnance Department at Large, United States Army (H. Doc. No. 1972); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting estimates for the relief of certain disbursement officers of the Army (H. Doc. No. 1973); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16749) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to collect and publish statistics on the production, manufacture, and marketing of crude petroleum, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1330), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19122) to amend the act of Congress of February 17, 1911, entitled "An act providing for the purchase or erection, within certain limits of cost, of embassy, legation, and consular buildings abroad," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1332), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. McKENZIE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4359) to amend the military record of William O. Sarber, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1327), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9402) for the relief of Sylvester Hannan, alias Henry Edwards, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1328), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 147) for the relief of John W. Cupp, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1329), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. TILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14763) for the relief of Charles Lynch, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1331), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. McCRACKEN: A bill (H. R. 20351) to provide for an investigation and report relative to the adoption of a system of old-age insurance or pensions; to the Committee on Labor.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1917.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee seeking Thy guidance as we face the uncharted paths of a new day. Thy law changes not. Thou art the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Thy unchangeableness is a guaranty of the blessings that have come to us out of the past, our rich inheritance, and prophesies as well the coming days of gladness, and hope, and light. We pray Thee to give to us Thy grace that our minds may be instructed; that our hearts may be responsive to the Divine command; that all things in our lives may be ordered according to the unerring counsel of our Father in heaven. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding session.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence, on account of illness, of the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. He is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained on account of illness. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding session.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. OVERMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ELECTORAL VOTES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, authentic copies of the certifications of final ascertainment of electors for President and Vice President chosen at the election on the 7th day of November, 1916, in the States of New York and Tennessee, which was ordered to be filed.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS (H. DOC. NO. 1974).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of documents and files of papers which are not needed or useful in the transaction of the current business of the Department of Commerce and which have no historical value. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] as the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 20209) to amend section 276 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KENYON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Seymour, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to reduce the high cost of living, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the use of all surplus moneys from naturalization sources for the education of immigrants, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a petition signed by the superintendent of the conference of the United Brethren Church of Ponce, P. R. It is very brief, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Cablegram.]

PONCE, P. R., January 22, 1917.

Senator GRONNA, Washington:

Conference United Brethren Church urges prohibition amendment Porto Rico.

DRUEY, Superintendent.

Mr. FLETCHER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Florida, praying for the enactment of legislation to found the Government of the United States on Christianity, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Garfield Post, No. 38, and Garfield Woman's Relief Corps, No. 9, Department of Florida, Grand Army of the Republic, of Zephyrhills, Fla., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the donation of two condemned mounted cannon, with a suitable complement of projectiles, to that city, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRYAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Florida, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Flint, Mich., remonstrating against any change in the postal rates on second-class matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a memorial of Local Union No. 101, United Mine Workers of America, and Messrs. H. N. Schuyler and Warren Penwell, of Pana, Ill., in relation to the enrollment of pupils in the United States Government aliens' school at that place. The Bureau of Naturalization, Department of Labor, have cooperated with thousands of public night schools for the instruction of adult aliens in approximately 700 cities and towns. Forty-five States are represented, in which over 8,000,000 of the 10,000,000 foreign-born residents of these United States live. I ask that it be printed at length in the RECORD. It is not a lengthy document. I do not ask that it be read.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Sent by Local Union No. 101, United Mine Workers of America, and Messrs. H. N. Schuyler and Warren Penwell, of Pana, Ill. Copy of article appearing in the Pana, Ill., Palladium, Dec. 6, 1916.]

MUCH INTEREST IN NIGHT SCHOOL—ENROLLMENT DOUBLED IN UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT ALIENS' SCHOOL HERE.

The night school which has been instituted by the United States Government for the adult aliens residing in Pana held its regular session at the high-school building Tuesday evening. There were 52 in attendance at this meeting, the enrollment having doubled since the previous meeting.

The school holds its sessions on Tuesdays and Thursdays of each week, from 7.30 p. m. to 9 p. m.

Following were the instructors for the meeting Thursday evening:

Domestic-science class: Miss Ruth Hammond.

Men's classes: Messrs. Simpson, Nyblach, Daniely, Ray, Andrews, and Hart.

The work of educating the foreign-born resident in this community is most fundamental and one of the worthiest endeavors in preparedness for national security and advancement. The aliens we want to help had for their objective in coming to America the identical purpose which prompted our forefathers, who landed upon these shores just as alien to this land as are the present immigrants. It is therefore the duty of every patriotic American citizen to further the education and uplift of these people. They are of many tongues, of divers thoughts and ideals. We must make of them a unit of English-speaking, English-thinking American citizens; we must bring to them a realization, in a practical way, of the ideals that impelled them to come to this land of opportunities.

The Bureau of Naturalization, Department of Labor, has cooperated with thousands of public night schools in approximately 700 cities and towns. Forty-five States are represented, in which over 8,000,000 of the 10,000,000 foreign-born residents of these United States live. The work is not an experiment; it is a marvelous success, a tribute to all those who have given their aid to it. In Pana, as in other cities, it is now only a question of keeping the good work before the public to insure its permanency.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hunt County, Tex., praying for national prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of the New England Association of Railroad Veterans, of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the separation of the Long Island Sound steamship lines from the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Wisconsin, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to exclude liquor advertisements from the mails, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT presented a memorial of the Town Criers of Rhode Island, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to exclude liquor advertisements from the mails, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HUGHES presented petitions of sundry citizens of New Jersey, praying that the immigration bill become a law at this session, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the Woman's Auxiliary, Railway Mail Association, of Spokane, Wash., praying for an increase in the salaries of railway mail clerks, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Mabton, Wash., and of the Sunday school of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Spokane, Wash., praying for national prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Golden Gate Branch, No. 214, National Association of Letter Carriers, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I present resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Nebraska, favoring the permanent abolishment of the practice of free-seed distribution. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
LINCOLN, NEBR.

Resolution.

Whereas it is reported in newspaper dispatches that Congressman REAVIS has decided to discontinue the distribution of free garden seeds to his constituents: Be it

Resolved, That we hereby commend Mr. REAVIS for such action, and suggest that his example might with propriety be followed by the other Nebraska Representatives. It is also

Resolved, That we call upon all the Nebraska Senators and Congressmen at Washington to do all in their power to secure the permanent abolition of the practice of free-seed distribution, which costs the taxpayers a quarter of a million dollars annually, and has long outlived its usefulness. Also be it

Resolved, That the chief clerk is instructed to inform the Nebraska Members of Congress of this resolution.

GEORGE G. WAITE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I present resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Nebraska, favoring the enactment of legislation to prohibit the granting of Federal permits or licenses for the sale of liquor as a beverage in prohibition States.

I desire to say that I have advised the speaker of the house of representatives that the resolutions are based upon a false assumption that the Federal Government issues permits or licenses, and that all the Federal Government does is to levy a tax upon those who sell liquor, whether they sell it in violation of State law or in accordance with State law.

I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
LINCOLN, NEBR.

Resolution.

Whereas 23 States of the Union have enacted laws or adopted constitutional amendments prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor as a beverage in such States; and

Whereas in these prohibition States it is a practice of persons who defy the law in order to reap the profits of illicit sales of liquor commonly provide themselves with permits from the Federal Government in order to protect themselves from prosecution in the Federal courts; and

Whereas the greatest hindrance to the enforcement of the people's will in respect to the sale of liquor arises from these so-called "bootleggers": Therefore be it

Resolved by this house, That we respectfully memorialize Congress to pass an act prohibiting the granting of Federal permits or licenses for the sale of liquor as a beverage in prohibition States.

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and that the Nebraska State Senate be invited to concur therein by passing a similar resolution.

STEARNS.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 7796) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey to the Great Northern Railway Co. certain lands in the State of Montana for division terminal yards and other railway purposes, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 961) thereon.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18453) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 962) thereon.

Mr. CUMMINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1174) granting to the State of Iowa all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the land within the meander lines, as originally surveyed, of the lakes within said State, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 963) thereon.

NORTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 7644) to create a new division of the northern judicial district of Texas, and to provide for terms of court at Wichita Falls, Tex., and for a clerk for said court, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 960) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is that a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Archer, Baylor, Clay, Cottle, Foard, Montague, King, Knox, Wichita, Wilbarger, and Young shall constitute a division of the northern judicial district of Texas.

SEC. 2. That terms of the district court of the United States for the said northern district of Texas shall be held twice each year at the city of Wichita Falls, in Wichita County, on the fourth Monday in March and the third Monday in November. The clerk of the court for the northern district of Texas shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Wichita Falls, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Texas, Does this bill provide for an additional judge?

Mr. CULBERSON. No; it merely provides an additional place for holding court.

Mr. SMOOT. It is, then, a readjustment of the counties in which court shall be held?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 7963) to prohibit the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Territories.

By Mr. SMITH of Georgia:

A bill (S. 7964) to establish engineering experiment stations in the States and Territories in connection with States universities or engineering schools for the promotion of engineering and industrial research; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. STONE:

A bill (S. 7965) granting a pension to Samuel T. Holden;

A bill (S. 7966) granting a pension to Lydia M. Smith (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 7967) granting an increase of pension to John H. Helser (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 7968) to correct the military record of Second Lieut. Van Buren S. Reber; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 7969) granting an increase of pension to Frederick S. Webber (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 7970) granting an increase of pension to Dorr H. Mayne; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 7971) to provide for the interchange of teachers of the District of Columbia with other school systems in the United States; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 7972) granting an increase of pension to Edward Flannery (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 7973) granting an increase of pension to Eugene E. Scherrer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEWLANDS:

A bill (S. 7974) granting a pension to Mary L. Pritchett; and

A bill (S. 7975) granting a pension to Elizabeth S. Naylor; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 7976) for the relief of Rier Thorson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 7977) granting an increase of pension to Silas B. Garlick; and

A bill (S. 7978) granting an increase of pension to Nathan H. Applebee; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HUGHES:

A bill (S. 7979) granting an increase of pension to William H. Lasher; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Maine:

A bill (S. 7980) granting an increase of pension to Roscoe G. Tibbetts (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 7981) granting a pension to Charles A. Bushey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SHEPPARD (for Mr. GORE) submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for all necessary expenses for the eradication of the southern cattle tick from $631,560 to $750,000, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 19359), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey submitted an amendment providing that on and after July 1, 1917, post-office watchmen, messengers, and laborers in first and second class post offices shall be required to work not more than eight hours a day, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 19410), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 20079), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, yesterday I gave notice of a motion to amend Rule XXXVIII of the Senate Rules. I find that by inadvertence I described wrongly the paragraph to be amended, describing it in the notice as paragraph 3 instead of paragraph 2. I ask unanimous consent for leave to change the notice so that it will read "paragraph 2" instead of "paragraph 3" of Rule XXXVIII, and that then the notice may go over until to-morrow when I shall offer a resolution in pursuance of the notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

Mr. JONES. Let the notice be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read as modified.

The Secretary read the notice as modified as follows:

In accordance with Rule XL of the Senate Rules, I hereby give notice that on to-morrow I will propose that paragraph 2, of Rule XXXVIII, of the Rules of the Senate, be amended so that it shall read as follows:

"2. All proceedings of the Senate when acting upon nominations shall be in open executive session, except when the Senate by a majority vote shall otherwise decide. Upon a motion for a secret executive session upon any nomination, each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only. If the Senate decides that any nomination should be considered in secret session, then all information communicated to or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon such nomination concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon such nomination, shall be kept secret. If in any case charges shall be made against a person nominated, the committee may in its discretion notify such nominee thereof, but the name of the person making such charges shall not be disclosed. The fact that a nomination has been made, or that it has been confirmed or rejected, shall not be regarded as a secret."

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 326), as follows:

Whereas on the 22d day of January, 1917, the President of the United States appeared in person before the Senate and announced certain views touching the policy the United States should adopt and pursue respecting the principles upon which the belligerent powers of Europe should make peace, and respecting the manner in which the peace so made should be permanently maintained; and

Whereas the President declared in his communication as follows:

"I have sought this opportunity to address you because I thought that I owed it to you as the council associated with me in the final determination of our international obligations to disclose to you without reserve the thought and purpose that have been taking form in my mind in regard to the duty of our Government in the days to come when it will be necessary to lay afresh and upon a new plan the foundations of peace among the nations"; and

Whereas it is impossible for the Senate to take official action upon these grave matters until the treaties creating such new duties and defining this new plan have been made by the President and submitted to the Senate for ratification or rejection; and

Whereas it was the obvious object of the address to invite a free and frank expression from the Members of the Senate for guidance in his arduous work; and

Whereas the proposals presented to this body involve the integrity of the Nation and the peace of the world and it is our bounden duty to advise the President of our individual opinions concerning the undertaking upon which the country is asked to embark: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That on Monday, the 29th day of January, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business the said address of the President shall be laid before the Senate for discussion and its consideration shall continue to the exclusion of all other business until each Senator shall have had an opportunity to speak thereon; but no Senator shall speak more than once nor more than one hour.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I shall object; but I desire to say that, in the present pressure of business, for the Senate to set apart a week at this time merely to hear speeches on the part of Senators regarding the President's address made on yesterday is wholly out of the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STONE. I do object; and I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I object to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and suggest the point of order that the motion is not now in order. I think that I have a right under the rules to have the resolution go over until to-morrow——

Mr. STONE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I suggest the matter to the Chair.

Mr. STONE. I withdraw the motion to refer the resolution. Let it go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to refer being withdrawn, the resolution goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not desire to submit a resolution at this time, although I think there is a matter that should invite the careful consideration of the Senate, in view of the notice in the newspapers this morning that the Chief Executive of our country proposes to carry on a systematic and continued system of lobbying in connection with legislation now pending before the Senate. All that I desire to do is to read one or two short extracts from documents that are apparently forgotten and overlooked, although they are not so ancient.

I have here the Democratic platform of 1904, from which I read:

We favor the nomination and election of a President imbued with the principles of the Constitution, who will set his face sternly against Executive usurpation of legislative and judicial functions, whether that usurpation be veiled under the guise of Executive construction of existing laws, or whether it take refuge in the tyrant's plea of necessity or superior wisdom.

Then, in the platform of 1912, I find this language:

We believe in the preservation and maintenance in their full strength and integrity of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—each keeping within its own bounds and not encroaching upon the just powers of either of the others.

PENSIONS TO COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 327), which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That Senate Document No. 108, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, entitled "Pensions to Commissioned Officers, etc., United States Army, etc.," with additions and corrections to January 1, 1917, be reprinted as a Senate document.

NATIONAL LEPROSARIUM.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to present a request for unanimous consent to take up No. 282 on the calendar, which is the bill (S. 4086) to provide for the care and treatment of persons afflicted with leprosy and to prevent the spread of leprosy in the United States.

In presenting the request for unanimous consent I wish to make a statement. I have before me a letter from Lieut. Col. Munson, in charge of Camp Wilson, Tex., which I should like to read. It is very brief. It is addressed to the health officer at San Antonio and is as follows:

OFFICE DIVISION SURGEON,
Camp Wilson, Tex., December 27, 1916.

CITY HEALTH OFFICE,
San Antonio, Tex.

DEAR DR. KING: While dining recently with a party at the Tivoli Café, this city, I noticed a most characteristic and far-advanced case of leprosy eating at a table with several companions.

I am thoroughly familiar with leprosy, having seen not less than 5,000 cases in the course of health work in the Orient. This case presented the tubercular form, with advanced leontiasis, and ear lobes pendant at least 1½ inches. In my opinion, a case as far advanced as this is almost certainly excreting lepra bacilli in the nasal secretions as a result of ulcerative processes.

I do not believe leprosy to be one of the readily communicable diseases, but to have such a case eating at public restanrants and frequenting places of resort is to invite the transmission of infection. The Texas laws, I believe, call for restricted quarantine in such cases.

This case is in a white man, about 40 years of age, resident of San Antonio, and a member of a prominent German club. There should doubtless be no great difficulty in locating it and confirming the diagnosis by blood smears.

Very sincerely,

E. L. MUNSON,
Lieutenant Colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army,
Division Surgeon.

I have also a letter from Surg. Gen. Rupert Blue, under date of the 18th instant, quoting from a letter which he had just received from Dr. J. N. Hurtz, secretary of the State Board of Health of Indiana. He calls my attention to two paragraphs from that letter, as follows:

It seems impossible to quiet the excitement at Fort Branch on account of the presence of the leper. The people will not listen to reason. I told the officials of the town—and a large number of citizens gathered for the purpose—there was no danger of the transmission of the disease; but this had no effect upon them. They simply said, "A leper in a town is like a dead body in a house. Nothing can be done. Business can not go on as long as such condition exists."

I think a special bill will be introduced into our legislature this afternoon, and I will transmit a copy if I can get one, for I presume you will be interested.

I have reports from the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service showing that there are thirty-odd cases of leprosy reported recently in different parts of the Union. I hope we can get this bill considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes.

Mr. JONES. In line with what the Senator has said I desire to say that in one locality in the State of Washington it was ascertained a short time ago that an alien had come into the country a little over two years ago who had a very advanced case of leprosy. It was desired that this leper should be deported, the State not having, of course, made any provision for taking care of such cases. The department recognized the situation. This alien had come from a country in which the conditions are such that he can not be deported now. So we have this leper on our hands, with no way of taking care of him. The people are considerably worked up, just as is the case as shown by the letter from which the Senator from Louisiana has quoted. The National Government seems to be helpless in the matter; but something ought to be done.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for his statement. Briefly, this bill provides an appropriation of $250,000 for the creation of a national home for lepers. It provides that the States may send their leprous patients to that national home. A similar bill has passed the House of Representatives. I sincerely hope that no Senator will object to the immediate consideration of the bill, as it will take only a few moments and is so important.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I feel constrained to object. We have only passed one appropriation bill; less than six weeks remain of the present Congress, and if the great appropriation bills are not acted upon we are bound to have an extra session. I dislike to object, but I feel constrained to do so.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator will not object. I think it will take only a few moments to pass the bill. It affects every State, and there is great excitement in many of the States because of the existence of the situation to which I have referred.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the bill would only take a moment, I would not object; but I understand that on this side of the Chamber there is going to be debate, and, therefore, I can not consent.

Mr. RANSDELL. Of course, if there is going to be debate, I would not ask the Senator to consent to the bill being taken up; but I do not think the bill will be debated.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that on this side it will be debated.

Mr. RANSDELL. Can not we go on for 20 minutes, say?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Louisiana if this bill is on the calendar?

Mr. RANSDELL. It is on the calendar, being Order of Business No. 282, and has been, I think, unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, this bill is very early on the calendar, then, and if the Senate would agree at some convenient time to take up bills on the calendar it could very easily be disposed of. I think the proper way to have this bill and a number of other bills that should be passed upon taken up would be, just as soon as the appropriation bill is out of the way, for the Senate to agree to consider Senate bills on the calendar under Rule VIII until the calendar of unobjected bills is disposed of. In that way this bill and other bills that ought to be passed can be reached, acted upon, and sent to the House. I feel disposed to object to the present consideration of any bill, no matter how urgent or how important, that is in such shape that it can be reached on the calendar if the calendar is once taken up.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very much in sympathy with the bill of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], but at the same time I desire to say that I think there is very great force in what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] has said. There are other bills on the calendar of almost momentous importance, among them the juvenile-court bill of the District of Columbia. The committee that has had that bill in charge has given to it a vast deal of study; we feel that we have it in good shape and that it ought to be passed. All of those who are interested in the subject are awaiting the day when the Senate will take it up. I hope we can set one day aside, and that very early in the session, to be devoted entirely to the consideration of the bills on the calendar.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I am quite in accord with the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and of my colleague [Mr. POMERENE], but, I think, if the Senate were brought into personal touch with the leprosy situation as I happen to have come in contact with it recently, we would not hesitate three minutes to pass the bill suggested by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate, but very recently in my own State there arose an example of the difficult situation in this country in dealing with cases of leprosy. In that instance a soldier in the service of the United States had become infected with leprosy in the service of his country and was finally returned to his home. He was there thrust upon his local community for care. It is readily understood how perfectly incapable any local community in this country is to care for a leper. After some four or five weeks of persistent negotiation through the Federal Health Service, a home was found for this unfortunate man, and I think he was finally located in a hospital in the Canal Zone at Panama. Certainly the Senate could well afford to take up this matter and without discussion provide for a national leprosarium. I hope the Senate will consent to take this very worthy and much-needed action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I shall not object if the Senator will move to lay the bill aside if it is not disposed of by 12 o'clock.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will consent to do that if it is not passed by 12 o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I not only think there is much force in the suggestions of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Ohio regarding the proper method of discussing this bill and other bills on the calendar, but I very seriously question the propriety of providing for the care of a certain class of diseases by the National Government through the establishment of hospitals. I very seriously question the expediency, to say nothing of the power of the National Government, of establishing an asylum or a home for people afflicted with a certain disease.

It will inevitably operate as a precedent for the creation of similar institutions for the treatment of other diseases, and transfer from the States to the National Government the classification and the treatment of diseases which infect society and threaten their physical health and well-being.

I shall feel compelled to discuss this phase of the question when the bill comes up, and I do not know that I shall be able to do it within the time that still remains between the present hour and 1 o'clock. I shall therefore feel constrained to object to the consideration of the matter at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

THE SEAMAN'S ACT.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to have printed as a public document certain matter relative to section 13 of the seaman's act, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

WATCH-AND-WATCH SYSTEM.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to have printed as a public document certain matter relative to the watch-and-watch system at sea. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TREATY WITH DENMARK (S. DOC. NO. 686).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, concerning the treaty signed August 4, 1916, between the United States and Denmark for the cession to the United States of the Danish West Indian Islands, and the obligations of the United States under the convention.

The attention of the Congress is especially invited to the necessity for action being taken by the Congress during its present session that will enable the Government of the United States to discharge its conventional obligation to pay to the Government of Denmark the sum of $25,000,000, which by Article V of the convention the United States agrees to pay in full consideration of the cession within 90 days from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the convention. This exchange of ratifications was effected on January 17, 1917, so that the good faith of the United States requires the payment of the $25,000,000 not later than April 17, 1917, and to do this provision by the Congress during its present session for the payment is imperative.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 18542, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18542) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment of the committee is the last amendment in the bill, found on page 151, where it is proposed by the committee to strike out all of section 7 as printed in the House bill, and which reads:

SEC. 7. That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate per annum less than $1,200, and for increased compensation at the rate of 5 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate not more than $1,800 per annum and not less than $1,200 per annum, so much as may be necessary is appropriated: Provided, That this section shall only apply to the employees who are appropriated for in this act specifically and under lump sums or whose employment is authorized herein: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senate that now we come to the great test as to whether or not we desire to increase the salaries of all the employees of the Government under $1,800. This section was put in by the House, and if it is adopted here, of course, there will be a similar provision in every other appropriation bill. This bill, as is well known, applies only to the employees in the District of Columbia in the different departments. The Post Office appropriation bill when it comes over, if this section is adopted in this bill, will, of course, and ought to, include a similar increase for all employees of the Post Office Department. The same will be true of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the amendment apply beyond the fiscal year, if this appropriation is made?

Mr. OVERMAN. It does not. Every appropriation bill is only for the fiscal year.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that, but I thought—I had not examined the amendment—that perhaps it was continuing.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; the amendment is not continuing. The appropriation is similar to all other appropriations in this bill—for one year only.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator another question, if he will permit me, right there. If we adopt the amendment, why do we limit the increase to the appropriation for this year? Would it not be better, if we adopt it at all, to make it continuing?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senate can do that, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. I was trying to get the Senator's judgment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think we ought to do it in this bill, because every appropriation bill passed is only for the fiscal year—from the 1st of July to the 1st of the next July.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but we would have the same question up in every appropriation bill if that were done. Why not determine it once for all?

Mr. OVERMAN. All of the appropriation bills usually contain increases. There are no increases at all in this bill; but in other appropriation bills from time to time we increase the salaries of those who are worthy and whose compensation should be increased. The committee favorably considers them and frequently grants increases. Owing to the condition of our Treasury and finances this year we concluded to make no increases at all. There were some very worthy cases before us that ought to have had increases if we made any.

I have had a calculation made. This amendment, if adopted, will increase the appropriations carried in this bill about $1,385,000. A similar increase for all the employees in the District that are included in the estimates will amount to $28,000,000, in round numbers. That is, if this amendment is adopted, and a similar amendment is adopted on each appropriation bill, it will amount to $28,000,000. If you extend the appropriation to other employees outside of those in the Book of Estimates, I am told it will amount to $50,000,000. That is, postal clerks on railroads, and other employees outside of Washington, are not appropriated for in the Book of Estimates; all field agents are not included in the Book of Estimates; fourth-class postmasters, assistant postmasters, deputy collectors, assistant deputy collectors, deputy marshals, and assistant deputy marshals. I am told it will all amount to about $50,000,000. We have, however, a Book of Estimates giving the salaries of all the employees in the District of Columbia; and if we increase their salaries and those of the Agricultural employees, and the post-office clerks mentioned in that bill, and others, we are informed by efficient accountants that it will amount to over $28,000,000, whereas the increase carried by this bill alone will amount to $1,385,000.

Mr. President, I want to say that we examined into this question most thoroughly. Mr. McLarin, the leader of those who are asking for these increases, admitted that the clerks in the Government service are paid from 30 to 40 per cent higher than any other employees in this country, and of course that means in the world. The magazine called the Review of Reviews contains an article this month on an investigation they have made, and they say that the average employees of the railroads receive $756 per annum. Mr. McLarin says the average compensation in all industrial associations, including the great insurance companies, is $578. The average in the Government service is $948; so the Government clerks and employees are paid from 30 to 40 per cent more than other employees in other like employments, in industrial associations, or in the railroads.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator there, referring to the comparison that he makes between the salaries paid to Government employees and others, whether that is based on the average?

Mr. OVERMAN. I said the average.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not true that in the Government employment there are quite a good many high-salaried employees and officials who have a tendency to bring up the average? I wish the Senator could give us some information applying to the particular clerks affected by this amendment, the lower-paid ones. This amendment applies to those who are receiving salaries below what particular amount?

Mr. OVERMAN. Four hundred and eighty dollars. The charwomen, who work about an hour or two a day, are not included.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator give us any information as to how the salaries of those employees compare with those of the employees of railroads and other private employers?

Mr. OVERMAN. I was mistaken. The charwomen get $20 a month, but they only work about an hour or two in the night. They get $20 a month. That is the lowest compensation—$240 a year. The next is $480, then $720, $900, $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, $1,800, $2,000, $2,500, $3,000, $3,600, $4,000, and $5,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator give us any information about the salaries of the persons affected by this proposed increase as compared with similar occupations in business life?

Mr. OVERMAN. They are much better paid, so our information is. The Government pays 20 or 30 per cent higher compensation in all grades.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand from the Senator that the information applies to the average.

Mr. OVERMAN. Except these presidents of railroads who get $50,000 a year, and others—the higher-paid presidents of the railroads.

Mr. HUGHES. That increases the average.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course it increases the average.

Mr. NORRIS. And the salaries of the more highly paid Government officials do the same thing.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, outside of the President there are not any very high-salaried Government officials. The members of the Farm Loan Board get $10,000 a year, the members of the Supreme Court get $14,500, and the members of the Federal Reserve Board get $12,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; there are those. There are a great many, however, who get three, four, five, six, and seven thousand dollars a year.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Assistant Attorneys General get $7,500, but they are very few in number. The members of the Supreme Court get $14,500. The Assistant Attorneys General and the solicitors of the departments and the Assistant Secretary of State get five and seven thousand dollars.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Is it not true that a very much larger proportion of the employees of these industrial corporations are the low-grade employees, such as laborers?

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, I think that is true, Mr. President.

Mr. WORKS. That being so, the comparison is hardly fair, it seems to me.

Mr. OVERMAN. They have taken the low-grade employees here, also.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; but they are not nearly so numerous.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether that is so or not. It certainly is not so in the case of the insurance companies of the country. In the great insurance companies the salaries average 30 per cent less, and they are well-paid, high-grade men. There are no low-paid men in those companies, except the janitors.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that the vast majority of the clerks in the Government service receive more than $900—$900 and upward?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, yes, Mr. President; that is very evident.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very few of them receive less than $900?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, and there are only a few in this class that are getting wages that are so low, the proposal to increase their wages would not be a very serious one.

Mr. OVERMAN. I also want to call attention to the fact, Mr. President, that these Government employees have one month's annual leave, one month's sick leave, and they only work seven hours a day, whereas in all other institutions of this country they work at least eight hours a day, and they work 12 months in the year. So when you count that in, their conditions are far in advance of those of any other employees in the world. The sick leave is 30 days, the annual leave is 30 days, and then there is the great number of holidays that this Government has, and the short hours of work. Really they do not work more than six hours and a half. Of course when they go down there and report for duty they go about and drink water, and take off their wraps, and then they do that when they are about quitting, so really, I understand, the average is only six and a half hours; or suppose it is seven hours. If they work seven hours a day they work much shorter time than the employees in any other employment in the country. Therefore, with the great deficiency coming, $375,000,000, the question is, Does this Government want to spend at least $25,000,000 in the increase of salaries?

Mr. President, there is some sentiment in favor of this increase because industrial institutions have given their employees 10 per cent increase or so. Every one of the institutions that has done that has been making money out of this war—from 100 per cent to 300 per cent. I know some of the cotton mills down in my State have paid a bonus of 10 per cent to their hands. Why, they were making large dividends by reason of the great prosperity and the war, and they ought to have given it to them. It was just. But their wages are very much smaller—50 and 75 per cent less—than those of the Government employees.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. And then the Government employees get their checks every 15 days and every 30 days. They have no trouble about getting their pay. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator say that this prosperity is caused by the war?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I did not say that. I said it was on account of the war and the prosperity of the country.

Now, Mr. President, the question is before the Senate. I have said about all I want to say. There are thousands of men who would come in and take these places at the same salaries, and be glad to get them. Even in the case of the lower grade places—$40 and $60—I can get people, and have no doubt every Senator on this floor has applications from men to come here and take the salaries that are being paid now, and they would be glad to come and get them. I do not think we are in a position to give these increases now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator another question. Does not the Senator really think that there are a great many underpaid Government employees?

Mr. OVERMAN. I certainly do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Here at one desk stands an employee receiving $1,800. Here at another desk stands an employee receiving $900. They are both doing exactly the same kind of work, but one is receiving only half of the pay received by the other.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator really think that we ought to raise the salary of the one receiving the $900? Should there be that difference in salary between clerks doing exactly the same kind of work? Why could we not increase 10 per cent the salaries of those receiving, we will say, $900 or less, and leave the others as they are?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the trouble about this horizontal increase is that there are some people in the employ of this Government who are not doing any work at all who are getting $1,200, $1,500, and $1,600. They are old people. They can not work. It is impossible for them to work.

Why, we had an example given to us by a report from a department. In one department there were 25 people employed, pretending to do work. The head of the office said: "Get them out of here, all but five, and let them read the magazines, and I will take five men and do the same work." He did it, and 5 men did the work better than the 25 were doing it—and more efficient work. Twenty of the men were reading magazines while the five men were doing the work of that office.

As to this horizontal increase, take the man that is getting $900. His increase is $90. Take the man who is getting $1,000. The increase is $50. In the case of the man getting $1,100 the increase is $55. So the man who is getting $900 gets $90 increase and the man who gets $1,100 only gets $55 increase.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am speaking of simply increasing those who receive the lower salaries, and whose salaries are absolutely too low. If there are those who are receiving $1,800 and $2,100 and are not able to do the work, as the Senator has explained, and the head of the office is doing the work of 25 with 5 men or 5 girls who are receiving $900 each, would it not be economy to raise the salaries of those who are receiving the $900, and rather demote those who are receiving $2,100, and who can not do the work?

Mr. OVERMAN. We have seriously considered what we are going to do about it. We ought to have some commission or some board to reclassify all these clerkships and pay more to men of lower grade, when a man getting $900 is doing more work than a man getting $1,800. With these old men, old pensioners, getting $1,600 and $1,800, what are you going to do? Are you going to pension them? Are you going to retire them? They are there in the way and you can not reduce them.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that, of course, everybody recognizes there is great irregularity in the salaries paid to Government employees and they should be readjusted. A horizontal increase as a permanent proposition would be unwise, in my judgment, but this high cost of living is here now. If people are ever going to suffer on account of it they are suffering this year. Next year they may not need the money; the war will be over, and prices may resume a normal status. If we are going to increase the pay of Government employees I am in favor of increasing the lower paid, and the money should be immediately available, and not go over until next August or next January when quite likely the conditions may have reached a normal status again. It does seem to me if the lower-paid employees were put in a condition to provide for themselves this year, this month, this week, we would be doing justice to most of the employees, and we should not make a horizontal increase that was going to continue indefinitely.

Mr. OVERMAN. My experience is that when we raise salaries we never can decrease them. If we raise the salaries this year, it will be impossible to reduce them next year.

I agree with what the Senator from North Dakota says, that there ought to be a readjustment; but how are you going to do it? This committee has not time to do it. They do not know how to do it. I should like to have a commission do it, and I have an amendment which I am going to offer on my own responsibility to bring about that result. But here we are face to face with the proposition of increasing these salaries $25,000,000. It is $1,300,000 in this bill, and it was admitted by all persons who appeared before us representing these employees that they are paid 30 and 40 per cent higher than any other employees in the world. Take the Geographic Institute here in Washington. Skilled people do their work. A man told me he saw a Government clerk walking along with an employee of that institute. The Government clerk got $1,200 a year and the employee there got $65 a month. He was doing the same sort of work, and worked 12 months in the year, 8 to 10 hours each day; and here the Government employee gets all the holidays, 30 days' leave, 30 days' sick leave, and he gets 50 per cent higher wages.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think this is a pretty serious matter that confronts us. We might as well realize that all along the line there is an organized demand for an increase of pay based, at least in part, upon the theory that the extent of the number of Government employees, the extent of their organization, will intimidate legislators and force us to give the raise. So far as I am concerned it does not have that effect upon me. I am in favor of doing what is right toward our Government employees, but I am unwilling to see an organized force here in Washington and scattered through the States undertaking to drive Senators and Representatives, and I shall not yield one inch to their driving influence.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator if the Senate as a whole followed that line of reasoning just before the last election when we raised the salaries of a certain class of employees who were already receiving high wages that their votes might be obtained in the coming campaign?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know to what the Senator refers.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator? I refer to the raise of the wages of those engaged in interstate commerce, in the movement of trains, voting to raise the wages of those who received the highest wages in the entire service, without voting to help those who received the very lowest wages.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I still do not understand the Senator exactly, but if we did what he intimates I do not think we did right. I do not locate the place to which he refers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator not heard of the Adamson bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, the Adamson bill you refer to. I did not understand to what the Senator referred. I will not stop to discuss that bill now further than to say this: I am in favor of restricting the hours of the regular schedule on freight trains to eight hours a day. This was the real issue, and this was the object of the Adamson bill. The question of compensation as a final result of that restriction I would be glad to leave to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and enforce their decision.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator if that bill restricted the work to eight hours?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was not entirely satisfied with the bill, but that was the effect of the legislation. If the Senator says it was wrong, I ask him now to join me in doing what is right. Never let us claim that two wrongs make a right, and if we can cite action in the past that we condemn let us be sure now that we are not guilty of action that may be again cited with condemnation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say to the Senator that I was willing and very glad to have had him with me in voting against that bill when it was right before election, and that I will do the same thing now in voting against any such bill that raises a high salary 10 per cent or anything else; but I am ready to respond to those who are not receiving living wages that they may have it, and to vote for it at a time when it will have no effect upon any coming election.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator from Georgia should be congratulated on having forgotten the Adamson bill. Everybody has been trying to do that, but most people have not succeeded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I reply to the Senator that I am not trying to forget it. I think it was a proper thing to have done at the time. I do not like exactly the way in which it was drawn. If we had had more time to consider it, I would have been in favor of amending it. I said at that time upon the floor of the Senate that I would consider a nation-wide strike by the employees engaged in interstate commerce as little less than a crime. I state it again now. I am ready to vote for legislation that will make a nation-wide strike by combinations of employees engaged in interstate commerce a crime. I believe we should pass legislation that would make such a national calamity an impossibility. I believe that all the people of this country are entitled to some regard, and that the men employed upon interstate transportation lines should not be permitted in combinations to stop transportation from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf.

Mr. President, I now desire to come to a consideration of the question before the Senate, having expressed myself about as freely and I think about as aggressively in hostility to any movement for a nation-wide strike as any Senator upon the floor of this body will express himself. In doing so I have repeated what I said to the people in my State before the election and what I said to those who are engaged by employment upon these lines.

I desire now to read from a statement of the Secretary of the Treasury issued December 31, 1916:

> Upon the basis of existing revenue the estimated deficit in the Treasury June 30, 1918, is in round numbers $279,000,000. To this must be added $100,000,000 for the necessary working balance in the Treasury. The Treasury therefore must be replenished to the extent of $379,000,000 in the fiscal year 1918.

Mr. President, we should take these figures into our minds. We should appreciate their importance. The responsibility is upon us now to determine with reference to appropriations. Shall we be swept away by the organized effort of employees of the Government and add $50,000,000 to this deficit? I am very much opposed to such a course.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator from Georgia wants to be accurate in the statement that he makes, and I suppose he made it upon the statement that was made by the Senator from North Carolina that if this applied to all the employees as estimated for in the Book of Estimates by the Secretary of the Treasury it would amount to $50,000,000. I want to say to the Senator that that estimate is altogether too large. The amount would be $28,532,324.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does that estimate go into the rural post offices? Does it go into the entire service of the United States everywhere?

Mr. SMOOT. It goes to every employee of the Government. I have the detailed figures showing that to be the case.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. I will give the figures to the Senator when I obtain the floor, showing the amount that is paid to employees up to and including $480 per annum not only in the legislative bill, but in every other appropriation bill which will be passed at this session; also the amount beginning with $481 up to and including $1,199, the amount to those who receive $1,200, the amount from $1,201 to $1,800, and all above $1,800.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does that include the officers in the field service?

Mr. SMOOT. It includes every employee of the Government as estimated for in the Book of Estimates by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. OVERMAN. As I said, Mr. President, the Book of Estimates only estimates for the salaries principally in the District of Columbia. Mr. Brown, who is our efficiency agent, told me that those only were included in the Book of Estimates, and he said to me it will not cover the post offices; that the Book of Estimates applies only to clerks.

Mr. SMOOT. It will cover all the employees of the post office, because I have included the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. Brown spent a great deal of time with me, and so did other members of the Efficiency Bureau, in gathering the figures. We took every appropriation bill. Wherever a lump sum was provided for the employment of men or women, of course, we had to average the salaries that would be paid under a lump sum. That is the only thing in which there could be any discrepancy in these figures, and whatever discrepancy it would be very small, indeed, because we have taken the average that has been paid to the employees under the direct appropriations.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I said. It does not include a single clerk employed under a lump-sum appropriation, according to Mr. Brown. The salaries out in the country of postmasters are paid from a lump sum.

Mr. SMOOT. I said that it did include the lump-sum appropriations, but there may be a little discrepancy in the lump-sum appropriations with the employees paid under this subdivision, because we have to estimate the number that would be paid from the lump sum receiving $480, those receiving $600, those receiving $720, those receiving $840, and those receiving $900, and those receiving $1,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Utah and the Senator from North Carolina, the acting chairman of the committee, differ about the result of the proposed increases of pay to Government employees. They vary between $28,000,000 and $50,000,000. Twenty-eight million dollars is sufficient for my discussion. That is big enough to shock me.

This condition of the Treasury is due largely to the fact that we are undertaking to develop a navy. I fully approve the development of the Navy. I regard it as of the utmost importance at this time, and I am willing to give to it every dollar possible. We may give it in the interests of all the people of the United States that we may be sure they will have a chance to make even the wages they are now making without interruption.

I believe, Mr. President, that we should consider the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that we are confronted now with a deficit of $379,000,000.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator from Georgia mean to say that he would withhold just compensation from the employees of the Government who are underpaid in order to build up a navy?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not. I think they are getting just compensation. They are getting more now than anybody outside the Government is getting for the same work. There is not a place held by any of those seeking increased pay where there are not 10 applicants for it if it is vacant. There are crowds of applicants. These lower places could be filled without any difficulty. They are paid more and do less work than outsiders of the same class do.

I had the privilege for three and one-half years of presiding over one of the largest departments in Washington. There is not a place where less work is done for the pay given than in the departments here in Washington. There never was any trouble in filling a $900 a year place. There were many applicants for each vacancy.

I believe in justice, but I believe in justice to the people who are not in office, and who are not organized to resist this increase.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator think it is an act of justice to decline to increase the pay of an employee where it is not what it should be because there are other people clamoring for the job?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I compare the pay of Government employees with what the same person could make outside of Government employment to help determine whether the Government pay is right or just. When we pay a Government employee we gather the money from people outside of office to do it. We gather it from the whole people to make the payment. Is it just to gather from all the people to give those who are in office more than is paid for the same work out of office, and that, too, when many, many out of office would be glad to have the place for the same pay, because it is higher pay and less work and a better place than that which is open to the great majority of people on the outside?

The people whom we represent are not organized in the fight; the Government employees are organized and persistent; they are a dynamic force demanding from us that we give them more of money collected from all the people. I would rather speak for the average man on his farm, or the average man or woman at work at home who have no organization. I would rather represent them than yield to this organized force of Government employees.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. I am not able to appreciate the force of the position taken by the Senator from Georgia, that this matter should be judged by the number of people who are wanting the jobs. There are a great many people in this country who would like to have the Senator's job at less than $7,500 a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They have an opportunity every six years to get it.

Mr. WORKS. But that does not prove, Mr. President, that the Senator is being paid too much for his services.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And it does not necessarily prove that my services are worth what I am getting. It may be that they are not; it may be that I ought not to be here; but two years ago my people passed on that question, and four years later, if my health is as good as it now is, I will give them another chance to pass on it. If they are not pleased with what I have done, they will stop it altogether. That, however, has not anything to do with the question under consideration, I submit most respectfully to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, that is just exactly the position I was taking, that the Senator's argument that somebody else is wanting the job has nothing to do with the just payment of compensation to our employees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If my argument had stopped there, the Senator from California would be right; but it did not. I said they wanted them because we were paying more for the same work than our constituents out of office got for the same kind of work, very much more; and that we are making the places better than the same places are in private life; that we pay the clerks who are now seeking salary increases more than they could make anywhere else.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, let us look at that just a little. Suppose it be true that other people are paying starvation wages to their employees; is that any reason why the Government should do the same thing?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But are they starvation wages?

Mr. WORKS. That is not the question. The Senator from Georgia is putting it upon the ground that people are clamoring for these places because they can get more than they are getting from corporations or other employers. Now, what has that to do with the question of just compensation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It helps to determine what is just compensation; it helps to determine what the particular work is worth. Necessarily, to a large extent, the pay that a man can get for his services in private life helps determine the value of his services in public office.

Mr. President, I want to read a few figures to the Senate. In 1913 the average farm laborer in the United States received $250 per year; the average farmer made $600 a year; and the average teacher in the United States did not make $600 a year.

Mr. WORKS. Right in that connection, Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Georgia whether he thinks that sort of pay for a teacher is adequate and just compensation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would vastly prefer to see it better.

Mr. WORKS. Does not the Senator believe that that sort of compensation is too low?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I say that I would vastly prefer to see it better; but surely when we consider what we are to pay for our Government employees we must consider what the conditions in the country make it practicable for our ordinary citizens in private life to earn.

Mr. WORKS. I do not agree with the Senator about that. There is no reason why the Government should pay insufficient wages because somebody else does the same thing; and I have not an answer yet from the Senator as to whether or not he thinks the pay of teachers, such as he has suggested, is fair compensation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did answer the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I did not understand the Senator to answer.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said I should vastly prefer to see the teachers better paid.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From what is the Senator from Georgia reading?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am reading from a statement which was prepared in the Post Office Department from facts gathered through the Department of Commerce.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Senator a statement of the average salaries paid in the trades and industries as a whole?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not those figures.

Now, again, the average farm laborer in Alabama made $175; the average school-teacher $446; in California the farm laborer made $421, the school-teacher $804; in Colorado the farm laborer made $309, the school-teacher $306; in Connecticut the school-teacher made $449; in Iowa the farm laborer made $368, and the school-teacher made $326; in Massachusetts the farm laborer received $306 and the school-teacher received $455; in Oregon the farm laborer made $372 and the school-teacher $605; and in Pennsylvania the school-teacher received $744.

Those figures were prepared under the supervision of the Postmaster General, and they have been furnished by him to the Post Office Committee of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from New York rose first, I think, and I yield to him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to ask the Senator from Georgia if the figures he has just read with respect to the payment of teachers and farm laborers take into consideration board, which is customarily given to farm laborers and to teachers in the country districts?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think board is usually given to teachers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the country districts it is quite usual to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so; that is not my own observation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from Georgia will find that allowance has been made for board in both the statements which he makes; in other words, the reports are made making due and proper allowance for board.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know in my State there could be no such allowance for the salary of the rural teacher. The salary in the case of teachers has no reference to board.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps I was unfortunate in the expression when I said "usually allowed." It is, however, not an uncommon thing, as I happen to know, to give board to the teachers; and board is certainly usually allowed to farm laborers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the latter statement I agree with the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And it is impossible for me to comprehend the correctness of the statement to the effect that the average payment of farm laborers in a State like California is only $420. It is impossible to hire a man on a farm for that sum.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield next to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has largely anticipated my suggestion. I know of no instance in New Jersey where a farm laborer does not have his board and lodging; and in very many instances such laborers have not only their board but they have a comfortable little home in which to live. With the school-teachers also it is a very common thing for teachers outside of the larger cities, in the country school districts where the teachers are maintained by the district, for the parents of the children to lodge and take care of the teachers.

I feel while I am on my feet, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not yield to the Senator from New Jersey for a speech, but merely for the statement which he has made.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no desire to make a speech.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator from Georgia is anticipating very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines further to yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Georgia just read a statement as to the average pay to teachers in the State of Pennsylvania. May I ask him to repeat that, so I may know what the sum is? I think the Senator said it was $720.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The average salary in Pennsylvania was $744 for school-teachers.

Mr. OLIVER. I merely wish to advise the Senator that, in addition to the sum of $744, there is now taking place throughout nearly all of the State of Pennsylvania, and certainly in that part of the State in which I live, a movement for advancing the pay of teachers, based solely upon the fact that it is costing the teachers more to live—the very reason which is back of section 7 of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think the low figures quoted with relation to the average yearly wage of farm laborers and also of school-teachers come about in this way, that in many sections of the country they are not employed for the entire 12 months of the year, but are employed perhaps for 6 or 7 months of the year, and the figures quoted are based on an average year's salary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On yearly income.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; on yearly income; and that is why some of the figures are so extremely low.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, Mr. President; but with all these explanations, which I am glad to hear, because the figures were shockingly low, still it remains that the figures show us that we are paying the Government employees in Washington more than the same character of work brings elsewhere.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I quite agree with the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] that two wrongs never make a right; but in this comparison between the farm laborer and the farmer and the Government clerk there is nothing yet in the record which discloses the relation to the wages of the farm hand and the profit of the farmer of the living which the farm laborer and the farmer get. The only business interest that I have in the world is as a farmer. In the South there is furnished to the farm laborer a home free of rent. I know the tenant system largely prevails in the South, but certain advantages are given, such as an allowance of ground for the production of garden truck and other allowances, while in the North, as a rule, I think, the farm hand is boarded and the farmer gets his living off of his farm. I want to ask the Senator if that does not illustrate the danger of making comparisons where conditions are entirely different? The clerk in the Government employ has to pay rent; he has to buy everything that he uses; and it hardly seems to me fair to compare his wages—although I again insist I agree that two wrongs do not make a right—with the wages of the man who receives in one way or another a large part of his living outside of the cash compensation for the year's work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield readily to the explanation of the Senator from Minnesota. I think most of us realize that as to the average farm laborer that distinction exists. If it did not exist, the figures as to relative pay would simply be shocking, for, as shown by these figures, the pay of the farm hand is not half of the pay of our lowest paid employees, for instance, in the janitor service or the messenger service of the departments. What I wanted to convey to the Senate was the income producing power of the average man and the income producing power of the average woman.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, how is that shown with any degree of definiteness when the great items of rent and cost of living are eliminated from the comparison?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It may not be shown exactly, but you can add those items to the figures I have given and still you leave me with the conclusion I have reached.

Mr. CLAPP. I can not agree to that.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. WEEKS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield first to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If you add to the income of the farm hand, to whom the Senator has referred, a sufficient amount to cover his living——

Mr. CLAPP. And that of his family.

Mr. BORAH. And that of his family, assuming that he is here in Washington, you will add more than he is getting according to the figures quoted by the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not assuming that the farm hand is here in Washington.

Mr. BORAH. I am assuming that the man we are dealing with under this bill is here in Washington.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I will come to that.

Mr. BORAH. And if you add what is necessary for him to have in order to take care of himself and his family in the way of actual living, you will add more than the farm hand is getting, because it actually costs more to live here than the farm hand is getting.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I was going to suggest, Mr. President, that there is no value in comparing gross income. The only value to be obtained from comparing income is as to net income. The farm hand who lives with the farmer receives a certain amount of pay which is practically net. Everything that he has to buy, or practically everything, is the clothing he wears. The same thing is true, comparing domestic servants with the clerk in the store. The domestic servant receives everything except the clothing which he or she has to buy; and if you compare a wage of five or six dollars a week for a domestic servant with a wage of ten or twelve dollars a week for an employee in a store, for example, you will find that the domestic employee, from a dollars-and-cents standpoint, is infinitely better off.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I partly agree with the Senator from Massachusetts and I partly disagree with him. Take, first, the domestic servant. The domestic servant has the expense usually of rent. The majority of domestic servants have the expense of rent, and certainly the expense of their clothing.

Mr. WEEKS. But, Mr. President, that statement is certainly not true as to the North, not even in the slightest degree.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is true right here in Washington. Has the Senator any accurate statistical information on that situation in Washington?

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator applies it to colored servants in Washington I think probably he would be partially right, but he would not be right if he applied it to the white servants. The houses in Washington are provided differently from what they were 25 years ago. In houses constructed 25 years ago it was presupposed that colored servants would be employed and that they would live in some other place than the premises where they worked, whereas houses are constructed differently now, and the statement, so far as the North is concerned, that domestic servants live elsewhere than on the premises where they work, is not true at all in the slightest degree.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not the slightest doubt that the majority of those employed in domestic service in Washington live away from the houses in which they are employed, and I say that from my personal observation. There is a class of houses, the best houses, the most expensive houses, which are prepared with rooms for the domestic help, but the large majority of the houses in Washington have no such provision; the large majority of the apartments in Washington have no such provision, and the large majority, I have no question, of the domestics in Washington rent quarters away from the place of their work. Now, we can not settle that, because we have not had any exact investigation; we can only speak from our personal observation, and that is my personal observation, and I feel great confidence in the accuracy of the conclusion I have reached.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall be glad to go on with part of the questions that have been asked me. I will yield again to the Senator in a few minutes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. All right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, I wish to go on with reference to farm labor.

A great deal of farm labor is paid a fixed monthly wage. It does not include the board of the family of the laborer, if he has a family. It rarely includes the board of the family. It probably furnishes shelter; in some instances, if the man is single, it includes his board; but where the farm laborer has a family it does not usually, I think, include board for all his family.

Now, I concede that in taking these farm-labor figures we might, perhaps, with propriety double them to make the comparison. I recognize their lack of exact value. I recognize the justice of the criticism upon them if the proposition were made that they should be used as actually establishing the exact productive capacity of the farm laborer.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It occurred to me, apropos of the comparison the Senator is making of Government employees with outside labor—that is, with farm labor and general labor throughout the country—that possibly he had in mind some of the lowest-paid labor on the outside. Let me call his attention to the condition in the city of Detroit, a great industrial center, and especially to one concern, whose example is coming to be followed by other concerns—namely, the Ford automobile factory. The minimum wage paid there is $5 a day for about 313 working-days in the year, which makes something over $1,550 received by the employee. Now, the Senator will not say, upon reflection, that these are skilled employees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I was just going to ask the Senator if that was true.

Mr. TOWNSEND. These men comprise perhaps 100 different nationalities, speaking half that number of different languages, coming in there some of them from penitentiaries—as Mr. Ford has made a specialty of employing men who do not seem to be able to get employment elsewhere on account of a criminal record—and all obtaining this high wage. It is also a known fact that this higher wage paid by industrial enterprises in Detroit has taken away from the Government a number of its employees, because they can obtain better wages in these factories than the Government is paying.

I speak of this because if the Senator wishes to make this comparison with outside labor it seems to me he should make it with these more progressive concerns who recognize the fact that a laborer is worthy of his hire, and that he is entitled to just compensation for what he does, regardless of what anybody else pays.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if I should make a comparison of any class of labor employed by the Government or employed anywhere with the treatment that Mr. Ford has accorded to his labor I would take the comparison entirely out of the class of practically all American labor except that of Mr. Ford. I take off my hat to him for his magnificent treatment of the men who work for him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator, I think should bear in mind also this fact, which I am sure he will recognize if he gives it proper attention—that this very example set by Mr. Ford, and possibly inspired by a gentleman connected with him who has not been given as much credit as he ought to be given, has had its effect upon other employers throughout the country, notably in that community; and wages which heretofore were very low are averaging up very well to Mr. Ford's standard of $5 a day, because of the recognition of this principle that the man who is paid what his services are worth renders a greater equivalent to his employer. He is a better servant, a more profitable servant than the man who is paid an inadequate salary, something that he has to struggle to live upon, rather than being paid for what he knows his services are worth.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I want to give my most hearty approval to the sentiment just expressed by the Senator from Michigan. I have made a number of speeches of that kind myself—not, perhaps, as well expressed—but he can not induce me to dissent from the splendid sentiment he has given us.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan a question. Does Mr. Ford pay his messengers and his clerks and his stenographers $5 a day?

Mr. TOWNSEND. His women and practically every employee of his concern. I have heard that statement disputed; but Mr. Ford himself informed me some time ago that every man or woman that he took into his employment he thought should be worth $5 a day, and that he proposed to pay that. Yesterday a gentleman stated to me that there were some persons in Mr. Ford's employ who did not receive $5 per day. That was the first information I had had to that effect.

Mr. SMOOT. I have heard, Mr. President, that Mr. Ford did not pay his clerks or his messengers or his stenographers $5 a day, but that he did pay every mechanic that was employed in his shop at least $5 a day, and many of them higher wages than that. Now, of course, we are dealing in these appropriation bills with messengers and clerks and stenographers, and that is the class we are trying to benefit—that is, some of us—by an increased wage. Even in this legislative appropriation bill there are chief engineers and there are machinists that are getting $5 a day; but a great many of the clerks are not getting that. It is the lower-paid employees, of course, whose salaries I am interested in seeing increased.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not want the Senate to understand that I am here advocating a flat salary for all classes of Government employees. I am simply urging the point, which I think can not be successfully disputed, that there are concerns in this country—not only the Ford concern but others—who are paying better wages than the Government is paying for the same class of employees; and therefore, if we are going to make a comparison, we should pick out the more favorable ones, those that are recognizing the justice of adequate compensation, in order that the comparison may mean something to us.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If Mr. Ford is paying $5 a day to his charwomen and to his messengers, he is simply distributing from his generosity some of the wonderful profits that his genius has brought to him; that is all. It is not a business proposition.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, but it is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If he is giving his charwomen, his ordinary cleaners, $5 a day and the machinists $5 a day—if he has put the simplest and cheapest of manual labor upon exactly the same plane that he has put the skilled intellect and the skilled hand, he has a right to do it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. He has not done that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The laborer who came in at the last hour was paid with the laborer who had worked for the whole day. That is all right if the money given belongs to the giver, but not if it belonged to one other than the giver.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hope the Senator did not understand me to say that that is Mr. Ford's policy. Mr. Ford fixes the minimum wage at $5, and pays higher wages to the more skillful employees. He fixes $5 as the minimum; and the Senator suggests that it is possibly not good business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How is that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood the Senator to suggest that it was not good business to pay these inferior workers $5 a day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I did not say that. I said it was not based upon a business proposition but a matter of generosity.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But I beg leave to dispute that proposition. Mr. Ford maintains, as do the men who are associated with him, that it was the best business stroke that that concern ever made; that they started out with an idea, perhaps, of helping the worker, although Mr. Cousins—and I mention his name as one of the great geniuses who made the present Ford Co. possible—suggested that by paying these men this larger wage they would earn more money for the company; and they have, until the money has been rolling into that concern in fabulous sums.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The money began rolling in before these increases were made, however; and I think it was a splendid use of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to read one extract from the hearing, as to the examination made into the great insurance companies of the country, which probably is a better comparison than the automobile factory?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is the statement of Mr. Denning, in the House hearings:

> At the direction of the Postmaster General, Mr. Brown, Mr. McReynolds, and I spent a week in New York City and a week in Philadelphia going through commercial institutions employing large numbers of clerks on work comparable with our own. We have made studies at various times elsewhere, but we took two points in the East which we thought would give a reasonable basis for our standards. However, we contemplate going to Chicago and to Detroit as soon as time will permit in order to study clerical methods in some institutions in those cities, so that we may get an idea as to the prevailing salary scales in that section of the West.
> Mr. BYRNS. Was the investigation thorough enough to convince you gentlemen that it is a fact that employees in the Post Office Department under this reorganization are receiving from 15 to 30 per cent more than is paid for similar services in private establishments?
>
> Mr. DENNING. Yes, sir; it was amply convincing of that fact; in fact, in some cases they are receiving 50 per cent more, but in cases where this standard prevails we are confronted with the question as to what is a living wage in Washington. We have work for which we are paying $900 that the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., or the Curtis Publishing Co., or the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. are having performed for $600.
>
> Mr. BYRNS. What did you note with reference to the difference in hours employed?
>
> Mr. DENNING. The hours were practically the same as our own—from 9 to 4.30, with 30 minutes for the luncheon period.
>
> Mr. BYRNS. Do you mean by that that these employees in these private establishments were employed only seven hours, and that you based your recommendations as to the amount of salary to be paid upon the difference in the hours in the Government departments here and the hours during which the employees in these establishments were engaged?
> Mr. DENNING. In the institutions which we visited the office hours are from 9 to 4.30, just as the hours in the Government departments, but their annual leave, sick leave, and holidays are not so liberal as the leave and holidays under the Government service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This report should convince Senators that I am right in claiming that Government employees are well paid for the work they do.

The comparison is a fairer comparison than the comparison would be if we took up the case of Mr. Ford. I do not know how far he has gone in his business view of the subject, or in his generosity. Whether it is solely from a business reason, or whether it is a matter of generosity, I am gratified at his action.

Now, Mr. President, I want to come back to our Government employees here in Washington. I think I know pretty well what Government employees do in the departments. They are the easiest jobs, as a rule, filled by those who work. They are seven-hour-a-day jobs, and a good many of them start half an hour before quitting time getting ready to quit. [Laughter.] The time is seven hours and a half, with half an hour for lunch, which makes the workday seven hours. Saturday is a half holiday, and they have 30 days' regular leave, 30 days' sick leave, and innumerable holidays. That is all right.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I think the Senator has stated that when he was in the Cabinet he found that the employees in his department rendered but scant service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I did not make that statement.

Mr. WATSON. I think the Senator said that they rendered slight service, or language to that effect.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I said less work for the pay than any other class of people.

Mr. WATSON. Perhaps the Senator stated it in that way. Was the Senator in any wise responsible for that situation, or was he powerless to help it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As far as the Senator was capable at that time he speeded up the work. I found the law division three years behind on appeals, and I had the pleasure at the end of three years and a half of having it practically on current work. I started by setting them the example of being in the office at 8 in the morning and leaving at dark, and kept my own immediate force at work the same hours.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how many hours he was working in the summer time on that basis, and how many in the winter?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. About the same each day, and a few hours at night.

Mr. LIPPITT. Dark seems to be a rather variable quitting time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I took office in the spring and to that time of the year I referred. I would not say that in the summer the same practice prevailed; but every fair man must admit that the usual work in these departments is an easy job, and well paid.

Let us come down to the smallest paid places, the messengers. I do not think any of them ought to be under the civil service. I do not think any man with a family has any business coming here and taking a messenger's place. I do not think that is a job to take care of a family on here in Washington. I do not think it ought to be. I think the bright young boys at home who wish to take a night-school course here should come and take these messengers' places. They would be delighted to have them, and prepare themselves for their life work at night. The salary would pay their expenses, and they could do all the work required of them daily and have time to attend schools at night. I think all the men with families ought to quit these places and go home. It is no place for a man of family. It is not a position that we ought to undertake to support a man with a family on. It is a boy's place. It is the place for a young fellow between 18 and 22. They would make better messengers, do the work a great deal better, and be glad to get them at present pay. The Government is not called upon to support a man and his family in a place that is not suited for a man's work——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator—and I am asking for information, as he has had some experience in that line—would give us an idea about the work performed by messengers, and whether all messengers perform the same kind of work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not entirely. Some of the messengers do a heavier class of work than others, but the most of it is work that would be admirably suited to a bright young boy going to school at night. I have the gratification of knowing that there are several good lawyers, a number of excellent doctors, and a number of high-class engineers who utilized the opportunity during my service here to attend night school, doing efficient work during the day as messengers and attending school at night.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would be more explicit in regard to the kind of labor they perform. What is the duty of a messenger, ordinarily?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The duties of a majority of the messengers are to attend the door with which they are charged, to meet callers and show them in, to carry papers from one part of the department to the other, and to do the light work incident to the duties of a porter in the office of a man of business, relieved of the care of cleaning.

The POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. In making that explanation, is the Senator referring to the practice in the departments or in the offices of Senators?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am referring to the department. The messengers on the rolls of Senators as a rule are stenographers and do the work of a clerk.

Mr. POMERENE. That is very true, and they are miscalled messengers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are entirely miscalled. They are not messengers. I was referring to messengers in the departments.

Mr. NORRIS. To what extent does that misnomer prevail in the departments?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not say, but I do not think it prevails at all. I can say that it did not 20 years ago.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator state what remuneration those messengers get?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From $60 to $70 a month. Some of them, the junior messengers, get $40 a month, the smaller boys. In the Agricultural Department now they have boys from 14 to 16 years old who get $40 a month. Those at $480 are boys who attend night school as a rule, who are helping their families and support themselves while they are working at an education. The work is light enough to enable them to attend school at night. There is quite a number of them I know in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information. I have always understood that in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and also in the Government Printing Office the pay has been exceedingly low, and that the employees do not receive what they ought to receive. My information is very limited, and I should like to have the Senator's view as a member of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assumed the Senator was from his knowledge.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am a member of the Finance Committee. What has been disturbing my mind has been to meet by increased revenue this prospective deficiency.

Mr. McCUMBER. A great many Senators agree entirely with the Senator that the average wage paid the clerks in the departments is very much above the average wage paid for like services anywhere else in the United States, but there are a number who have been very much underpaid for years, if I am correctly informed. I wish to vote to raise their pay without raising the pay of those who are already receiving excessive wages compared with what the others receive.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say this to the Senator. I believe if you will study the departments you will find clerks getting $1,800 at places where clerks at a much less salary do the same work. I believe that a careful study of the work in the departments and the readjustment of salaries as a result of scientific investigation would be wise and most proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the further consideration of the pending appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of considering the appropriation bill. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Clerks in the lower grades do high-class work occasionally. It is not a rule, but you will find them scattered through the departments; and you will find that if the lower class clerk is especially bright and capable and ambitious for promotion the officers in charge, finding an increased pressure upon a line of work that is normally assigned to a $1,800 clerk, details a $900 or a $1,000 clerk to help there instead of leaving him to do the ordinary work of a clerk of lower salary. The clerk does it, and grows in knowledge, it being perhaps no more laborious work but more intellectual work, and the clerk looks forward to promotion.

Mr. McCUMBER. He may get it and he may not get it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If they get justice, they will get it.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will yield to me for a second, I did not have the pleasure of hearing the beginning of the Senator's remarks, so I am not thoroughly versed as to the ground he has covered. I should like to say to him that what seems to me to be the fundamental and underlying principle involved in this whole question is the fact that there has occurred in the United States within the last two years an entire revolution in the wages of labor. In practically all the great industries of the United States, with the exception of the railroad industry, there has been a very radical increase in the price paid for labor. It amounts as a minimum to 20 per cent, and in many cases it is very much larger than that.

These employees of the Government have been working for years upon a certain relation of wages to the wages paid in other industries, and when the wages in those other industries are increased in this radical way it seems to me like a very moderate thing, indeed, to add to the wages of these laborers 10 per cent, where people in other similar employments all through the United States have had their wages increased 25 per cent. The Government, as an employer of labor, must recognize in fairness the conditions of the labor market, and ought not to put itself in a position where it is necessary for employees to make an enforced demand by combination and union and methods of that kind.

I wish to say from my knowledge of what has gone on in the labor markets of this country, and in the price of living, that I think the project put in the bill by the House is a very fair one, and I propose to vote for it when I have the opportunity.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to reply first to the Senator from Rhode Island, and give him in a few words the line of argument I am making. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows us that for the year closing June 30, 1918, with our existing appropriations and existing revenue, we will have a deficiency of $379,000,000.

Mr. LIPPITT rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me finish my statement.

Now, then, my second proposition is that this clerical increase amounts to from $28,000,000 to $50,000,000. I think until we know where the revenue is coming from we ought not to add from $28,000,000 to $50,000,000 to our appropriation budget.

But I go further, and I say that the Government employees have been better paid and do less work for what they have been paid than any other class that can be found; that the hours of labor are less; that the extent of the work required is less; that their days of holiday are more; that their annual leave and sick leave are more; and now I will say what I intended to say, that they differ from the ordinary employee in industrial pursuits in the permanency of their positions and their pay.

In 1914 we had a scarcity of work. We had many out of employment. We had a decrease of wages in many places. Our Government employees continued. The adverse situation did not adversely affect them. Their jobs were permanent; their pay did not vary. All these facts should be considered when we are called on at this time to increase pay.

Now, I yield to the Senator for a question, but not for anything beyond that, I hope.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator simply wants to yield for a question, I do not know that I should say anything. The Senator made the statement in regard to the finances of the Government being a reason for not advancing the wages of the employees. I can not recognize that as a reason. If the Government has been extravagant and has spent its revenues to the full extent without taking into consideration the just demands that were likely to be made upon it by labor, by its employees, it is exactly in the position of a private enterprise which has taken an undue part of its earnings and paid them out in dividends, without realizing that in due time they would have to meet a demand for advanced wages. There have been no doubt a great many such private establishments in this country during the last two years that find——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I gather the Senator's view upon that subject. If there were nothing in it but the condition of the Treasury, if that were all, it would not be sufficient by itself,

Mr. LIPPITT. Then, as I understand it, the Senator eliminates that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not. It would be stupid to say that the financial condition of an enterprise should have nothing to do with the compensation that it paid to employees. There are a number of elements to be considered. If you had surplus money that you did not know what to do with, it is a splendid thing to give it with liberality to employees.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to make just a brief statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield for that, but I have done more yielding than I have talking.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has been very courteous and I appreciate it. I have listened to the Senator's recapitulation of his reasons, and I think there is argument in all of them. I concede that for the purpose of this question. I think all those things he has mentioned we ought to consider alike, although not any one of them perhaps ought to be considered apart, but they ought all to have just consideration.

I wish to ask the Senator if he does not believe in addition to those things we ought to take another item into consideration that to me seems to be of great importance, and that is the wonderful increase in the cost of living that all these employees must submit to and that they can not escape from?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. These are employees who when the cost of living becomes very cheap, when times are hard, get their pay just the same. In 1914 they all kept their jobs and got their pay. I think perhaps a little more economy would be required now than last year, but are we to put up and put down the pay of these people just as the price of wheat goes up and down? I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. Not entirely, but the cost of living proposition is something that affects everybody. We are all confronted with it. We can not escape from it. It has been so enormous that to a person getting a small salary it is a very great consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is a good deal in it and a good deal not in it. I believe with care in purchasing much of the claimed increased cost of living can be avoided.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to repeat the question I asked him some time ago, and which he has forgotten on account of the multiplicity of interruptions?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is whether or not the prices paid to employees in the two bureaus I mentioned are grossly insufficient?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not familiar with these bureaus. My knowledge of the departments proper is more thorough, due to my connection with one, and my continued observation since of the lines of work with which I was then connected. I know very little about the Government Printing Office.

Mr. OVERMAN rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assume the chairman of the subcommittee can give the information.

Mr. OVERMAN. For the Bureau of Engraving and Printing we appropriate, I think, $1,250,000. It is a lump sum, and the salaries are paid in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. I understand they are paid very high salaries; that the engravers get a large salary. As to the Printing Office, I think they get about what is paid elsewhere.

Mr. McCUMBER. As to the great number of girls who handle those machines my understanding is that they do not get $1 a day; that they do not get $60 a month; and some of them get only $5 a week.

Mr. OVERMAN. There are four different classes, as the Senator knows, at $480, $720, $840, and $1,000. The lowest is $480.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator think that we could raise those who are receiving only $480 without doing an injustice to the Treasury or an injustice to the country?

Mr. OVERMAN. That work is done by women generally. It is pretty hard on them, I know; but I do not think this is the time to increase salaries at all. That is the very question that is up. They do not have to work very hard. Those who get that sum are messengers, and they have short hours.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, just a word or two more in detail about the employees in the departments generally. The $480 places are not meant for men to support families on. They are boys' places. The $600 messenger places are not meant for men to support families on. They are, as a rule, boys' places, and they are all the better filled if filled by boys. There are some laborers' places, perhaps, at $600 a year, and those are just employees who use manual labor; $50 a month is very fair pay for a man without skill who furnishes nothing but physical force. You are obliged to grade compensation somewhat according to the character of work. Fifty dollars a month—$40 a month—for an ordinary day laborer who does nothing but clean the floor, relatively speaking, is pretty fair compensation. There are not a great many of them. We pay our Senate office force of laborers $40 a month. I think that is the price we pay the force who come in at night and clean up the Senate Chamber. We pay them from $35 to $45 a month. We pay a part of our waiters downstairs who work not all day, but half a day, $30 a month.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator know how many hours such employees put in?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the Senate Office Building?

Mr. WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think they go on duty at about 11 o'clock at night and work for four or five hours. The work is done in the latter part of the night, so as to avoid interfering with the work of Senators. The $900 clerk in the department is a very well-paid clerk for the work.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. The thing that appeals to me very strongly respecting the employees who receive these small wages is that we are contributing to a standard of living in this country that ought not to be permitted. A man ought at least to have sufficient wages to allow him to live comfortably and decently in a country like ours. I think a great many of the salaries paid are entirely inadequate for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, let me say this to the Senator about these smaller places in the departments: They are places in which the young man starts or else he is old and incompetent and takes it as a pension. That is about the situation of those places. These $900 places are filled by two classes, part of them by the old and incompetent who have been put there practically as pensioners.

Mr. WORKS. I want to say about that, I have come to the conclusion that that is a very bad way to pay employees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not dissent from the view of the Senator, but I am stating the fact. The inefficient or aged who have been higher up and who have ceased to be able to do the harder work the department finds itself frequently forced to bring down to a very light job.

Mr. WORKS. The trouble about that system is that we not only pension a part of the employees at a higher rate of pension but at the same time they are absolutely in the way and hinder work that ought to be done by competent people.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not dissent from the Senator about that. If the Senator was at the head of a department and found there a man who had rendered long service competently, who had reached a place where he could not do it and was obliged to have the work done, and had no remedy but to give him some easy place or discharge him, he would not discharge him if he could help it.

Mr. WORKS. No; I imagine I would do just about what is being done now; but that does not help the situation. Congress ought to deal with the question directly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a defect of our system. I will say to the Senator we really ought to have a scientific study of the whole subject and we ought to legislate, changing the plan.

Mr. WORKS. With a great deal of hesitation I have come to the conclusion that we will be driven before very long to establish a pension system that will take care of these old employees, furnishing them some reasonable means of living, and at the same time getting them out of places where they are utterly incompetent to carry on the business of the Government in some systematic and efficient way. I will say, I have come to that conclusion with a good deal of hesitation because I am not very fond of entering generally into the matter of pensions. I think the larger the dependent class is made the more unfortunate it is for the people of this country. But something must be done to clear out these departments and make them more efficient in carrying on the affairs of the Government. That is one of the ways that I think we will be compelled to resort to sooner or later.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I was seeking to explain was that the lower salaries of $900 are received, as a rule, by bright young men and women, who are advanced with experience, and they go on up toward the higher places.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. STERLING. Is the Senator able to state how long a clerk or employee who starts at $900, unless he has a promotion, will remain in that place in the ordinary course of business? How long before he will be promoted to a place paying a higher salary?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As a rule—an efficient young man—in two or three years.

Mr. STERLING. It will be many years, will it not, in the ordinary course of business, before he reaches a salary of $1,200?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not think so. I do not think there are many efficient young men who have been in the service for many years who do not get $1,200 or more.

Mr. STERLING. My impression has been that a young man starting at $900 will be compelled to serve five or six years before he is promoted to the $1,200 class.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. According to our own system here of compensation for our stenographers, $1,200 and $1,400 is the basis for a stenographer who helps a Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator whether there is any authority of law, when clerks become aged and unable to perform the duties of the various positions which they hold, for demoting them and putting them down again to a lower grade?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The authority of law is vested in the Secretary to adjust his forces and to assign them to such places as he deems proper. He has the right to promote or demote a clerk.

Mr. NORRIS. Then those clerks who become worn out with the work of their various departments on account of age, who are kept on the rolls and bring about so much difficulty because they are kept, could be reduced in salary down to the lowest grade.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They could; $900 is the lowest grade they could be reduced to.

Mr. NORRIS. So, as a matter of fact, the Secretary of one of the departments under existing law would really have the power in effect to pension the employees to that extent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But he is limited by this. He must find a place where the balance of the force can keep up with the work. He could not just load up the lower grades with men of that character, so that the work required from those grades would not be done at all. I think the practice is, speaking frankly to the Senator, it was, I know, when I was very familiar with it, where one who had been efficient in the service, for some cause, age or sickness, had reached a place where he or she needed lighter work, to try to find an easy place somewhere as near the salary as possible, and, if necessary, at a lower salary; that is, to try to find an easy place for a faithful clerk who had ceased to be able to do the work that he formerly did, and in this way avoid discharging the clerk.

Mr. NORRIS. I listened, for instance, to-day to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who spoke of 25 clerks doing a certain amount of work and replacing them with 5 very efficient clerks and doing the work better. I wondered, when those conditions arise and the Secretary or other official out of the kindness of his heart does not find himself able to discharge them, no matter what he paid them, even if they do nothing, could at least reduce the salary down to the lowest grade, so that in effect it would really be pensioning them for that amount.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Secretary has the right, and I think it is done as far as it can be done.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I was interested in what the Senator said about the ability of the lower paid clerks to secure promotions. I have never encouraged anybody to seek these places from the Government. I think it is a melancholy thing myself to see a young, capable, and energetic man going into one of these places and make a machine of himself there, and then on for the balance of his life, without any prospect of a right sort of promotion, but merely an increase of pay. I think it is true that there are a great many of these employees who, although capable and energetic, are not able to advance. I have in mind the case of a very bright and capable young woman, who was the daughter of a well-to-do farmer in Indiana, who I knew very well, who came here as a young girl. She has been practically in the same employment until to-day. She is a gray-haired woman. She has been employed in the same place, receiving practically the same pay, for nearly 30 years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the character of the work, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. WORKS. She is in the Patent Office.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the character of the work that she does?

Mr. WORKS. I do not know that; I have never inquired about it, and I am not at all familiar as is the Senator with the different kinds of work done in that department; but I am very much afraid that these advancements are largely through favoritism, notwithstanding the civil-service rules and regulations. I am led to believe that it is so, and I think it is exceedingly unfortunate. I think the case I am mentioning is a typical case where a young and intelligent person——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the salary which the lady gets?

Mr. WORKS. I do not know what salary she is receiving now. It is one of the lower salaries. I think it is more than the minimum salary, but it is a low salary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are a large number of ladies in the Patent Office getting, I think, a thousand dollars a year, which is very good pay for the work they do. Of course, if a lady comes into the department and does an ordinary line of work and does not learn something more difficult or prepare herself for some higher character of work she just remains in the low grade.

Mr. WORKS. I was speaking of a woman whom I knew to be a woman of rather superior intelligence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But one must specialize for some particular line of work in the Patent Office to be advanced beyond $1,000 a year. They have women there who have been advanced to salaries of, I think, $2,000 a year; they have been given the advance for which they have prepared. There have been men who came into the Patent Office at a salary of $900 within the past 20 years who to-day are up at the top, and they are at the top without regard to anything but their own thorough study and work.

Mr. WORKS. I have no doubt about the first statement of the Senator, but my experience and observation lead me to think that most of them have gotten to the top through political influence or outside influences and favoritism on the part of the heads of departments, which I think is exceedingly unfortunate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say to the Senator that I have in mind a Democrat, a Georgian, who was advanced before this administration came into power, during past years to the very top in the Patent Office work from the very first grade, just as the result of his study of patent law and his splendid force. I think the Patent Office especially recognizes merit. It is obliged to do so, for it is a technical line of work. A man who makes himself master of the work in the Patent Office will rise. If he simply contents himself with being an ordinary stenographer and typewriter, he has not done the work that will bring a raise, but if he is ready and willing to work overhours, if he makes himself very proficient, if he does that which would build him up in private life, he can rise in the department. I think the majority of the employees do not overexert themselves. They want a living; they are content with a reasonable living; and they want a reasonably easy time. That, I think, is the current spirit, and, of course, with that kind of spirit one would not advance in private position and one would not advance, and could not expect to advance, in Government position.

Mr. WORKS. One of the troubles about it is that the Government service and the manner of dealing with those things breed that very kind of spirit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senator from California is right. I think it is one of the serious propositions, and I can join with the Senator in his view. I have never advised young men to get into that rut. I have never willingly helped a young man get a Government place who I did not believe took it as temporary work. I have tried to help women who did not see a chance to make $900 in any other way, and who as copyists could make that sum in the Government service.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator from Georgia think he might well follow the example of the Senator from New Hampshire, who advises young women to stay at home and not to come here and take places in any of the Government departments?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not have in mind young women, but I had more in my mind widows who had reached that condition by some casualty. I have one in mind right now, 42 years old, a capable, strong, splendid woman, who has two girls, whose husband died a few months ago, who would be delighted to take a $900 place in one of the departments. She has a good education, a strong physique, and I would recommend her to take such a position.

Mr. GALLINGER. Cases such as the one to which the Senator from Georgia now refers are exceptional.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to suggest that I have received scores of letters from fathers and mothers urging me to try to secure employment for their daughters in the departments at Washington, and I have invariably written them that the worst possible thing, in my judgment, that they could do for their girls was to send them to this city and let them take employment in the departments. I think that is a sound conclusion, as a rule. But as to the women to whom the Senator from Georgia refers, widows and women of more advanced age, it is different, so far as they are concerned.

Now, if the Senator will permit me one other suggestion—I have no disposition to utter a partisan word at all, for I think the evil existed in Republican administrations as well as under Democratic administrations—when it comes to promotions, the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] suggested that the heads of departments could exercise favoritism. That is not where the favoritism is exercised, but it is exercised by the chiefs of divisions and by the chief clerks, who can so manipulate things that they can promote their favorites, and they do it constantly, in my opinion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from New Hampshire is entirely right. It is extremely difficult for the head of a department to get from these subordinates an unbiased estimate of the work that is done in the department so as to know how to really recognize merit.

If one more personal reference is excusable, I desire to say that I issued an order forbidding outside commendations with reference to any clerk in the Interior Department when I was Secretary of the Interior. I recited in the order that such outside recommendations interfered with the work of the clerk, and in the general effort to promote solely on account of proficiency required them to be charged up as a demerit against the clerk. But it is a very difficult thing to do; it is almost impossible.

Now, in conclusion, I want to say that there is no one who would be pleased to see those that are needy get an increase more than I would. I do not, however, believe that we ought to enter into these increases of salaries at this time. I think that now especially we ought not to do so. I think we ought to consider the whole situation; I think we ought to consider the fact that those of us on the Finance Committee start out with the duty of trying to meet a deficit of $379,000,000 for the year 1918. I do not say whose fault it is; that is not the question; but if it exists it is our fault if we do not handle it. Now, while we are preparing to handle it, we ought not to pile up any increased expenditure that we can possibly avoid.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Georgia has startled me a little. Does the Senator speak by the book when he says there will be a deficit of $379,000,000? We have been talking about $300,000,000, and that has somewhat alarmed the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The $379,000,000 includes the $100,000,000 working balance for the Treasury. I perhaps should have said $279,000,000 deficit, but the Secretary of the Treasury says—

> The Treasury, therefore, must be replenished to the extent of $379,000,000 in the fiscal year 1918.

I read that from a statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I have consumed a great deal more time than I intended to take; but I think Senators will all agree that they have divided it pretty generally all around the Senate Chamber during the time I have been on the floor.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I want to make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia before he takes his seat. I desire to call this matter to his attention, because he was at one time the head of a Government department. In the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations we drew the attention of the heads of departments to section 7 of the bill, and asked them how it would work in their various departments. Without exception, they said that the recommendations of the promotions which they had made would work equitably among the clerks, and would be something approaching justice, but that a horizontal increase would only serve to cause discouragement among the better class of clerks; that it would be very inequitable and would be a clumsy way of trying to meet the situation. They suggested that, if we could grant the increases which they had recommended, it would help the service. We were not able to do that, because the committee felt that the clerks could go along for another year at the present compensation. What is the Senator's idea about this horizontal increase as compared to the plan which prevails in all the departments of recommending meritorious cases for advancement in pay?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, undoubtedly for the good of the service, if the departments could recommend the promotion and increase of salary of those who were really doing that which merited promotion and increase of salary, by their zeal and efficiency, it would contribute much more to the proficiency of the departments than to give this horizontal increase. I want to say just one word more.

Mr. WATSON. As a matter of fact, are such promotions and increases of salary ever recommended?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That has been the usual custom.

Mr. WATSON. I know it is supposed to be, but I ask the Senator has it ever been a real workable policy?

Mr. BRYAN. Of course, Mr. President, that has been done in this bill by the House committee.

Mr. WATSON. Have such promotions been made because of efficiency?

Mr. BRYAN. Undoubtedly, and that is done on this very bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not only promotions have been recommended on account of efficiency, but there has been the creation of an additional number of clerks in certain classes, at the instance of the heads of departments, so that opportunity of increase may be given to clerks of special merit. I know in the Agricultural appropriation bill the department has requested increases of clerks in higher paid classes and decreases in lower paid classes, to make provision for increased pay to clerks on account of proficiency. The Secretary of the department will say: "I have made that recommendation of the increase of a higher grade clerk and the decrease in the lower grade because there is a clerk in this lower grade who has done such meritorious work that I want to give him an increase to the $1,200 grade, and there is not a vacancy in the $1,200 class. Therefore, I ask you to reduce the $1,000 class by one clerk and to increase the $1,200 class by one clerk." That is the way the promotion is made, and such recommendations come from the department.

Mr. BRYAN. And, of course, that was done on this bill, as it is done on other appropriation bills.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the plan that the departments have of lessening the number of clerks of a little lower pay and increasing those of a little higher pay, and vice versa.

In conclusion, I urge that no justice can be claimed for a horizontal increase of pay. I have shown that many with the small pay are boys, others ordinary day laborers, and that $900, the lowest pay for a clerk, in fair compensation for the work done.

The task of objecting to these increases is not pleasant; but, convinced that the responsibility rests upon us to hold down appropriations, I earnestly support the action of the committee.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I think the committee, in striking out section 7, and Senators who favor striking it out, have not been paying strict attention to its real intent. There has been a great deal said in the course of this debate to the effect that the Government is paying more for the class of help affected by this section—that is, the low-paid, low-priced help—than is paid in private establishments. There is no doubt in my mind that the Government pays for a great deal more help of this class than it ought, and that it grants indulgences in the shape of leaves of absence and sick leaves to a greater extent than is wise. Those indulgences, however, and the salaries allowed are our fault and not the fault of the clerks. They have been allowed by Congress in years past. To my mind, not only the question of sick leaves and of vacations ought to be revised by Congress, but the salaries and the number of clerks ought also to be revised.

There is now at work an Efficiency Board, which proposes to do away with a great deal of unnecessary help and to prevent duplications. If that board is allowed full swing, and if its recommendations are carried out by future Congresses, or, as I hope, by the next Congress, an enormous saving will be effected to the Government. But, in the meantime, these men and these women are working for salaries prescribed by Congress, none of which will afford more than a reasonable living, and they have naturally regulated their scale of living to the salaries they have received. I leave it to any man who has had to spend money for living expenses during the past year to say whether for a thousand dollars he can buy as much of any of the necessaries of life as he could for $800 even one year ago. As a consequence of that condition, the class of men and women affected by this section are confronted with the necessity of doing without a great many things to which they have been accustomed or of running in debt. They have to buy less clothing for their children and less food for themselves, or, if a man has been provident enough to buy himself a little home, depending upon saving enough out of his salary to pay for it by installments, the mortgagee comes in and takes that home.

It is the intent of this section to give to each one of this class of employees during this year only not enough to compensate for the increased cost of his daily living but something to help along and enable him to bridge over this trying season which is on us.

If this bill provided for a permanent increase of salary, I would vote against it, because I believe that in that event it would prevent the rearrangement of matters which the Efficiency Board will, I hope, bring about; but it only provides for the increase during this year, and I think, as a matter of justice and common humanity, we ought to be generous enough to grant this increase to these poor people.

To be sure, there is a large deficit in the Treasury, and economy is the watchword of the day. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations and of the subcommittee which had this bill under consideration, I voted against a great many items which I should have liked to allow, because I wanted to help along, so far as I possibly could, in the direction of economy; but I tell you the Government of the United States ought at least to be just, and it is a poor kind of justice, Mr. President, that provides a salary of $10,000 a year to the members of the Federal Farm Loan Board and refuses an increase of 10 per cent to a poor laborer who is working for $450 a year, and such act will not give the public a good opinion of the sincerity of the Senate in its effort at economy.

So far as I am personally concerned I expect to vote to retain section 7 in the bill, but if that effort is not successful I will vote for any amendment that may be proposed that will tend to give assistance to the lower class of employees in the Government departments, even if it does to a small extent swell the enormous deficit with which we are confronted because of the extravagance of this Congress and of the Congress preceding.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I may be called away from the Chamber later, I desire now to say a word in regard to this matter. I agree with those who urge the necessity of economy in public expenditures; indeed, I think the subject of economy in public expenditures is a vital subject and one which ought to have much more attention and consideration than we have been disposed to give it for the last several years. It is one of the most trying subjects with which we have to deal, because we can only with difficulty find a place to begin, and begin effectively. But, Mr. President, extravagance in public expenditures is one thing and the principles of justice and humanity are another thing. I sympathize, in other words, entirely with those who would like to see greater economy in our public expenditures, but I am not willing to deny those who are working for the Government that which I think is absolutely essential for their proper living.

There are people working for the Government, Mr. President, who live really upon the ragged edge of hunger from month to month and year to year. People working for the Government for $450 or $500 a year must necessarily be living constantly in the fear of want. It is a situation and a condition which I am not willing in the name of economy to perpetuate. We must be just and humane before we are economical.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Where will they be found in this bill?

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. BRYAN. There are no employees paid so small an amount as that named by the Senator under this bill, except charwomen employed for an hour or so a day The lowest salary in the bill is $660 a year. I do not know where the Senator got the idea that salaries as low as $450 and $500 are provided for.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I would just as soon take $600 as a basis——

Mr. BRYAN. I suggest that the Senator take $660, as that is the lowest.

Mr. BORAH. Because no one with a family can live in Washington upon $600 a year without living in the constant dread of want, and without, indeed, experiencing want many many times.

Mr. BRYAN. The lowest salary, as I have said, is $660. That is the lowest and it is paid to laborers.

Mr. BORAH. Now, I am not in favor——

Mr. BRYAN. Could a laborer who now gets $600 a year better himself elsewhere?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not he could better himself elsewhere, but I do know, regardless of the question of whether or not he can better himself elsewhere, that the question of his mode of living and his way of living is something that we ought to consider at this time.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. Mr. President, I say frankly that I do not see how a person working for $600 or $700 a year here in Washington, if he has anyone dependent upon him at all, can live without being constantly in the fear of hunger. He must necessarily contemplate that, if he has sickness or any misfortune of any kind he is going to be overtaken by actual want. Now, what I say is this: We ought to take care of that condition of affairs. The Government of the United States ought not to set the example of paying such a salary as will bring the people who are trying to earn it into a condition of mind where they feel that they are not being treated as citizens ought to be treated by their Government. I would pay no more than a moderate salary to any one and I would pay a just and humane salary to everyone.

We voted the other day, for instance, for a salary of $10,000 a year for officials who will work no more earnestly than those who earn $600 a year. Of course, the higher paid officials have expert knowledge, and we should pay accordingly, but we should not pay these exorbitant salaries at one end and reduce the others to an actual state of dependency or want or poverty at the other. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have heard it referred to here to-day several times that the employees who are getting these low salaries might better their condition if they went somewhere else. Assuming that the work is essential to the maintenance of government—and if it is not, then Congress ought to provide for its abandonment—if the man who is to-day doing the work for that salary should go elsewhere, we would have to look somewhere else for some one to take his place and then impose upon the newcomer the same condition. So I can not see the force of an argument that would still leave us obliged to have somebody do this work at the meager salary we are now paying.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question, because he is better informed on this point than I am. The Senator has referred to the cost of living in Washington. Is it more expensive for a laborer to live here than in other cities, a city like New York of Philadelphia, for instance?

Mr. BORAH. Well, I am not certain I know. I do not want to say just what I think about the conditions which superimpose prices in Washington.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to say to the Senator that it occurs to me that there might be some justification for increasing those receiving the lowest wages from $660 to $720, which is the next grade, and those receiving $720 to the next grade, which is $840; but I am at a loss to understand why, with all the prosperity which is in the country, a laboring man should remain in a Government position if he can get a higher rate of pay in private employment.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will pardon me, I have studied the very subject to which the Senator from Florida refers from the standpoint of the producer, and I say without any hesitation that, in the main, it does cost more to live in Washington on the same scale of living than it does in other cities with which I have made comparisons. Prices are higher here, and I think that is the verdict of everyone who has studied the subject.

Mr. BRYAN. Are rents higher—living expenses?

Mr. CLAPP. Living expenses. I am speaking now more particularly of the table expense, the question of food.

Mr. BRYAN. And of what class of people—that is, with reference to their income?

Mr. CLAPP. I am not speaking with reference to income. I am speaking with reference to the market price of the stuff that goes on the man's table. I have studied the question to a considerable extent; and I know it as the result of my investigation, and I think it is generally agreed, that the prices of food products are higher in Washington than generally in cities of the same size.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will take his lead pencil for a moment and undertake to spread $600 or $700 over a year's living, after he has paid for the food, the clothing, the rent, and so forth, he will be the most puzzled man in the world to know how to take care of the last three or four months of that year; and the wonder to me is how it is possible for these people to do it. It is a constant wonder to me how these people can live upon such a small salary here in this city. I do not know how they do it. I pity the unfortunate individual who must struggle through from month to month under such conditions. It must eat away soul as well as body.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I understood the Senator from Florida to say that $660 was the lowest salary provided in this bill except for charwomen, and so forth. On page 22, under the Library of Congress, under the division of order and accession, the salary of the chief of the division is $2,500, and then there are provided for two assistants at $600 each, and one assistant at $580. Then, under the catalogue, classification, and shelf division, the chief of the division gets $3,000, and there are 13 assistants at $600 each, and four assistants at $540 each. That is on two pages of the bill. I have not gone further.

Mr. BRYAN. That is a very unusual condition, and there can not be more than a very few of them. The Senator from Utah knows what they are.

Mr. SMOOT. There are quite a number of them that are drawing $480 in all of the bills.

Mr. BRYAN. What are they?

Mr. SMOOT. They are messengers, some of them—I mean, assistant messengers.

Mr. BRYAN. The messenger's salary is fixed.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the messenger's salary is. The salary of the assistant messenger is not.

Mr. BRYAN. There is a regular grade for assistant messenger.

Mr. SMOOT. There are employees that are outside, and also employees under the lump-sum appropriations, that are paid $480. In fact, Mr. President, the amount in this bill of salaries of $480 and less is $361,561.

Mr. BRYAN. But the salaries of the charwomen are fixed——

Mr. SMOOT. They are included. The charwomen's compensation is $240 a year.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And then there are some salaries at $300, some at $360, and some at $485.

Mr. BRYAN. What class of people are they? What do they do?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, they are just assistant messengers and laborers down in the Botanical Gardens, special laborers around the Department of State and the Treasury Department, and so on.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to get in on this discussion somewhat, as I am supposed to have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BORAH. The comparison is constantly being made here between the employees of the Government and the employees in industries throughout the country. I want to say to the Senator from Florida that it has been one of the mysteries to me how laborers in this country live in these times of exorbitant prices on an average of six and seven and eight hundred dollars a year. I do not understand it. I have never seen anyone who did understand the economy by which it was possible for them to get through from year to year.

I will tell you, Mr. President, what it is doing for this country. It is doing for this country precisely what it did for England and some of those European countries, as was developed by the condition which confronted England at the breaking out of this war. When she called upon her young men and upon her people from the industries to take their place in an effort to preserve their Government, she was astounded to find that physically their stamina had been undermined to such an alarming extent as to necessitate a change in the rules for enlistment in the army. The people who for years and years, night after night and week after week, had tramped Trafalgar Square asking for bread, suffering for want of the actual necessaries of life, were unable to meet the tests which it was necessary for them to undergo in order to perform service for their country.

You can not fit a man for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship in a great Republic like this upon an income of six or seven hundred dollars a year when he has a family to rear. If a man lives upon that amount, and meets day after day the responsibilities of a man with a family, he must necessarily undergo those conditions of mind, those undermining and destructive forces, which unfit him for the duties of citizenship. If we do not take this into consideration in the future we shall meet a condition sometime which will imperil our whole social fabric.

One of the great wonders of this great conflict is the marvelous fighting capacity of the German people. If you will go back into the history of Germany for the last 40 years you will find some key to the success of the German people in this great conflict. Germany, whatever else she has done or failed to do, has taken care of her working people. There were no paupers in Germany when the war broke out. There were no people in that country who were walking the streets asking for bread, or for a place to earn a living, and a method and a means by which to take care of their families.

The conditions therefore which shall guide me in fixing the salary which a person ought to have for performing service for this Government is what is reasonable, humane, and just. I feel that we ought to pay a reasonable compensation to those who are performing this service. I am not in favor of raising at all the salaries of those who are drawing above $1,000 a year. I would limit the increase at this time, for this time only, to those who are drawing under $1,000 a year. I believe that we can do that, and without any great burden to the Government at this time; and while I do not know that I shall have the shaping of the amendment, if I had my way about it I would make such an increase concerning the salaries or wages of those who are now earning under $1,000 a year, and for this year only. I would make it in the nature of a bonus and leave the future to deal with itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. I offer it as a substitute for section 7, stricken out by the Senate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the committee amendment the Senator from Utah proposes to insert at the top of page 151 the following:

SEC. 7. That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for increased compensation at the rate of 15 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate per annum of $480 or less, and for increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate of more than $480 per annum and not exceeding $1,000 per annum, so much as may be necessary is appropriated: Provided, That this section shall only apply to employees who are appropriated for in this act specifically and under lump sums or whose employment is authorized herein: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the first place I wish to say that as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I reserved the right to offer this amendment on the floor of the Senate, and before discussing the reasons why in my opinion the amendment should be adopted I think it very proper, indeed, to call the attention of the Senate to just what this amendment will cost the Government of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KENYON. Since the Senator is entering upon a discussion of this matter, it seems to me that we should have more Senators present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hollis	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Hughes	Newlands	Smoot
Borah	Husting	Norris	Sutherland
Brady	James	Oliver	Thomas
Bryan	Jones	Overman	Thompson
Catron	Kenyon	Pittman	Tillman
Chamberlain	La Follette	Pomerene	Underwood
Clapp	Lane	Ransdell	Vardaman
Clark	Lee, Md.	Reed	Wadsworth
Culberson	Lewis	Saulsbury	Walsh
Cummins	Lippitt	Shafroth	Watson
Fletcher	Lodge	Sheppard	Weeks
Gallinger	McCumber	Shields	Williams
Hardwick	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Works

Mr. CLARK. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN] on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when interrupted by the call for a quorum I was about to state to the Senate what the amendment that I have offered will cost the Government, and also what the House provision will cost the Government. I wish to state that the figures I give cover all the employees of the Government appropriated for in all of the appropriation bills for this year.

The salaries paid by the Government in the bill under consideration to employees receiving $480 or less amount to $361,561. In all other appropriation bills, as estimated for by the Treasury Department, the total is $10,673,245, or a total of all appropriation bills of $11,034,806.

The amount paid in salaries in this appropriation bill, the legislative appropriation bill, to all employees drawing salaries between $480 and $1,000, inclusive, is $5,103,375; in all of the other appropriation bills $110,281,300, or a total of $115,384,675.

Salaries between $1,001 and $1,199 carried in the legislative appropriation bill amount to $1,134,867; in all other appropriation bills $44,052,012, or a total of $45,186,879.

Salaries of $1,200 in the legislative appropriation bill amount to $5,602,790; in all other appropriation bills $102,194,136, or a total of $107,796,926.

Salaries beginning with $1,201 and including $1,800 in the legislative appropriation bill amount to $11,185,755; in all other appropriation bills, $76,480,824; or a total of $87,666,579.

All salaries in the Government service above $1,800 carried in the legislative appropriation bill amount to $5,606,955; in all other appropriation bills, $26,363,313; or a total of $31,970,268.

This makes a total of all salaries in the legislative appropriation bill of $28,995,303, a total in all other appropriation bills of $370,044,830, and a total in all appropriation bills of $399,040,133.

Mr. President, the amendment that I have offered, which provides that salaries of $480 and less shall be increased 15 per cent, would cost the Government $1,655,220, and an increase of 10 per cent upon all salaries between $480 and $1,000, inclusive, would amount to $11,538,467, or a total cost to the Government of $13,193,687.

The Senate may want to know about how much the House provision will cost, if adopted. The House provision provides for an increase of 10 per cent upon all salaries up to and including $1,200. The amounts paid to the employees of the Government receiving salaries as named in the House provision, and on which 10 per cent increase is proposed, is $171,606,360. Ten per cent of that would amount to $17,160,636. The 5 per cent provided for in the House provision, on salaries above $1,200 up to and including $1,800, would amount to $11,371,688, or a total in all of $28,532,324.

Mr. President, I also have here figures showing what a straight 10 per cent increase upon all salaries up to and including $1,000 would cost. There is no amendment before the Senate at this time proposing such an increase; but I will state that if there should be an amendment of that kind proposed it would cost the Government $12,641,948.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose the Senate were to strike out section 7. It would then go into conference. Would not the Senate conferees then be in a better position to compromise and settle this matter in conference, probably rather along the line of his amendment, than if we adopted his amendment here?

If we should strike out section 7, of course there would be a disagreement with the House. Then we would come to a conference. The Senator from Utah would be one of the conferees. Would it not be better not to amend this section, but to strike out section 7, and let this matter go to conference; and then would we not be in better position to work out some scheme that would be satisfactory and agreeable and along just lines?

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President, I do not believe we would, because if we simply struck out section 7, then the conferees on the part of the Senate would be virtually instructed by the Senate that they did not wish to grant an increase of salary to any employee of the Government. If my amendment is adopted, then the whole provision will go into conference and the difference between the House and the Senate will be only the difference between my amendment and the provision in the House bill. If the House insists upon the full increase as provided in the House bill, then the only thing for the conferees to consider is as to whether the Senate will agree to a further increase in salaries as provided for in my amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows that when this matter goes into conference it will be the duty of the conferees of each body to insist upon their amendments and to adjust and compromise the differences, as far as possible. That is always a matter for compromise.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the differences would be greater if we simply struck out section 7, and gave no expression on the part of the Senate, than if we at least voted that there were increases that the Senate would insist upon, and that they do not propose to go lower than those increases.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that one of the controlling features of his amendment is a larger increase for the lower wage earners, going to 15 per cent. That would not be in conference if the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina were adopted, because the highest increase authorized by the House is 10 per cent, and the conferees could not then with propriety exceed that in any agreement they might make.

Mr. OVERMAN. The whole matter would be in conference.

Mr. CLAPP. Not an increase beyond what one House or the other had provided for.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator from Minnesota says is true as to the 15 per cent. Mr. President, I do not believe there is a Senator or any other person who will not feel that it is simply doing an act of justice to any employee of this Government who is receiving a salary less than $480 a year to grant him a 15 per cent increase.

I call attention to the amount that is being paid under the appropriation bill to the employees of the Government who are receiving $480 and less. It amounts to $11,034,806. In fact, Mr. President, I do not see how those poor people live upon their salary. I can not see how they can keep their children warm or clothed. I believe that the least we can do for any employee in the Government service receiving $480, considering the high cost of living to-day, is an increase of 15 per cent.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if the employees receiving $480 per year give all their time to the Government service.

Mr. SMOOT. They give all their time to the service of the Government. They are laborers provided for in the bill. For instance, take the Patent Office. The statutory wage fixed for a labor is $660, and where in this bill you find 10 laborers and the salary not specifically mentioned they will get $660. But all through the bill you will find 10 laborers $660, 10 laborers $420.

Mr. KENYON. Have those men families in some instances?

Mr. SMOOT. In many instances they have families.

Mr. KENYON. I think it is an indictment against the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. My amendment, Mr. President, will partially correct that evil.

Again, I have received hundreds of letters during the last two weeks protesting against the same increase upon a salary of $480 as a salary of $1,000. They say that there is a discrepancy now; that the difference between the salaries paid at present is large enough without having a horizontal increase and making that discrepancy more pronounced than it is to-day.

I recognize that a 10 per cent increase upon salaries up to and including $1,000 can not be absolutely fair to all the employees of the Government. It is impossible where brackets are made to do that. My attention has already been called to the fact that in the case of an employee who is receiving $1,000 to-day an increase of 10 per cent would give him $1,100, whereas the man who is receiving $1,100 gets no increase under my amendment. But there is this to be said about it, that the man who is receiving $1,100 at least can keep hunger from the door, and he can get fuel enough to keep his children warm and to supply clothing.

I frankly admit, Mr. President, as I have done before, that there are employees of the Government who are receiving more salary to-day than they could receive anywhere else on earth. I wish that the Appropriations Committee two years ago had provided for a commission, or if not a commission for a committee of Congress, to go into the different departments of the Government and regulate the salaries paid to the clerks in all the departments. I know the charge has been made that there is one man or one woman doing exactly the same work as a man or woman who may be working by the clerk's side, the one receiving 40 per cent and sometimes 50 per cent more than the other. It is not right, and it never would be allowed in a business concern.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. There is not any question but what it is true that there are many clerks working side by side doing the same work and one clerk is receiving perhaps twice the pay the other clerk receives; but is it not also true that this happens in the case of the old clerks, and if we were to adopt some reasonable retirement system it would eliminate those older clerks who are getting the larger salaries and doing less work, and thereby do away with a great deal of the dissatisfaction there is now in the departments.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that particularly applies to the Pension Office and to a limited extent it applies to other departments of our Government.

Mr. POMERENE. It does not apply to the same extent, but it does apply pretty generally to all the departments.

Mr. SMOOT. Not to the same extent.

Mr. POMERENE. It is true in the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMOOT. I admit that seniority of service has a great deal to do with the salaries clerks are receiving; more so, I will admit to the Senator, than the value of their service. Of course the Senator knows my position in relation to a retirement plan that we have been working over for months and months.

Mr. President, I admit freely that the average salary paid to the Government employee is higher than the average salary paid to men doing similar work in other avocations of life, but the comparison as given to-day is hardly fair unless we take into consideration the conditions surrounding the Government employees and those in other avocations of life doing similar work. We all know that the employees of the Government receive 12 months' salary each year, whereas in the industrial concerns of the country the employees change places oftener than the employees of the Government. In all the industrial concerns of the country, in all the commercial walks of life, when the census is taken the amount that is paid for salaries is computed and it is divided among the number of employees actually engaged by the concern during the year in which the census is taken. In other words, it is hardly fair for this reason: In the Government service a clerk works 12 months in a year and he may receive a thousand dollars. Take two of them who will work the same way. There is no change during the whole year, and the average will be a thousand dollars, whereas in the industrial concerns of the country there may have been a change, not once but twice or three times, and when the salary is divided by the number of clerks the rate paid them appears to be very low, and that would be the average wage. Therefore, in considering that question we must take into consideration the fact that the Government employee works every month in the year, with the exception, of course, of a leave of absence of 30 days that he has given him, and the time of the sick leave which they are allowed.

I am not saying, Mr. President, that the Government employees in ordinary times are generally paid better than the employees of the industries of the country, but I do believe that the Government pays a less wage, particularly to those who receive a wage less than $480 per annum, than almost any institution in the United States. It is for that reason that I want to see the difference between the increase made as proposed in my amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I notice that the Senator, in his statement, assumes that those to be benefited by his proposed amendment are the heads of families. Is that true in any large proportion of the cases?

Mr. SMOOT. There is testimony showing that there are perhaps 50 per cent of them heads of families. The other 50 per cent were not heads of families; but I want to say to the Senator that in many cases a widowed mother is dependent upon the girl or the boy who is working for these wages.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has any effort been made to select the heads of families and supporters of others in this proposed increase?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not that I know of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me it is rather undiscriminative and that we have to raise in a horizontal way salaries of employees of the Government, without regard to whether they have others dependent upon them or not. The Senator's proposal may raise the salary of a girl or a boy who receives a thousand dollars a year, to whom that thousand dollars a year is sufficient, while a man receiving $1,200 a year and supporting a family receives no benefit of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just coming to the question of a horizontal increase. I know that a horizontal increase in a salary of Government employees is not a perfect way of increasing salaries, but I do know if the horizontal increase is made in a salary not above $1,000 there can be but very little injustice done, and I believe that in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred the increase will be justified.

The same thing may apply, I will say, to clerks drawing salaries above $1,200 up to and including $1,800. Many of them are single men, many of them are women with nobody on earth to depend upon but themselves, and the same injustice would occur in a higher rate as in the lower rate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is doubtless aware of the fact that in many instances a man and his wife are both employed in the public service, a man and his son, a man and his daughter; sometimes, I think, two daughters. So it is a very difficult matter to adjust this in a fair and equitable way. I think it is impossible unless every individual case is studied, and that would involve, of course, a labor that we can not enter upon now.

If the Senator will permit me, as I left the Chamber a moment ago I heard the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] make a suggestion concerning a retirement plan which he thought would be more equitable and just, and yet every Senator knows there is no more chance of getting a bill of that kind through at this session of Congress than there would be of turning the current of the Potomac River and making it run up hill. We are not going to do it. So we have to consider this matter just as it stands. The only thing we can do, as I look at it, is to do about what the amendment of the Senator from Utah contemplates; that is, take care for the time being, for this year, of the lower paid employees. For that amendment I propose to vote, and I think it will do little harm to the Treasury. It will increase the appropriation somewhat, but it will be much better than any other system which has been suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not believe that I can be charged with desiring undue appropriations. I have tried in the past, when the Republican Party was in power, to guard against unjust and extravagant appropriations. I have in connection with a few others fought what we considered to be extravagant appropriations in the past. I do not believe that if we increase the salary of employees of the Government receiving a salary not exceeding $1,000 the people of the country will consider such action extravagant.

This amendment, as I stated before, will cost $13,193,000. A thousand times better, Mr. President, to cut that amount out of the public-buildings bill than not to do justice to these employees. A thousand times better, Mr. President, to cut it out of the river and harbor bill and do at least partial justice to unpaid employees of the Government.

In fact, Mr. President, I think the Government ought to be the model employer. I think they ought to have the best equipped offices; I think they ought to have the best class of clerks and machinists, and in whatever the Government undertakes to do it ought to be a model for all others employing labor. It always gives me a pleasure, Mr. President, to go to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, because that is a model shop. It is the best in the world and——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My inquiry to the Senator, it seems to me, raises the question whether the Government would be a model employer if it made a horizontal increase in salary. It does not seem to me it would be a model thing to increase the salary of a clerk with no one dependent upon him getting a thousand dollars a year and not increase the salary of the head of a family who might be getting $1,200 a year. The model employer would inquire into the equities of the case, whereas the amendment the Senator introduces provides for a horizontal increase, which would grant increases where they are not required and ignore them where the equities would seem to require them.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator again that if we had the time I would oppose a horizontal increase of salaries. It is not a proper way to do, nor would a model employer do it. But we have not the time; and yet under the conditions existing to-day, with the high cost of living jumping at rates unheard of or unknown in the history of the world, I do not believe there is going to be any injustice done in increasing the salary of employees who are affected under the amendment that I have offered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. And yet, notwithstanding this is an inequitable and unphilosophical system, it is the system that all the great industrial establishments have resorted to during the past year. From one end of the country to the other the great industrial establishments have increased the wages of their employees about 10 per cent; I think in one or two instances a greater amount than that. So they were unable to make the very discrimination that it is insisted we ought not to make here if we do justice to all the employees.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I wish to state that over a million men employed by the following concerns had their wages increased, and in some cases not only have they had their wages increased but they have had a bonus given them besides. Such concerns were the United States Steel Corporation, the Standard Oil, the Bethlehem Steel, the American Woolen Co., the cotton manufacturers of New England, the Eastman Kodak Co., the Consolidated Gas Co. and its subsidiaries, of New York, the Westinghouse Electric Co., the General Electric Co., the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and about three-fourths of all the railroads of the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. About 10 per cent was the increase.

Mr. SMOOT. The average increase is over 10 per cent, besides an average of about 5 per cent in the way of bonuses. I yield now to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to remind the Senator in connection with that statement that the incomes of these large private concerns have prodigiously increased during the past year or two. The income of the Government has not, while its expenses have been in some degree running on parallel lines with the increase of the incomes of large private enterprises.

I want to ask the Senator, also, if he believes that the increase of salaries will bring any real degree or permanent degree of benefit to those whose salaries are now under the cost of living? In other words, is it not a fact that as these salaries are advanced the purveyors of the necessities of life advance their prices so as to meet the new conditions and absorb the surplus?

Mr. SMOOT. Replying to the Senator, I will say that there is no doubt but what the companies I have named as increasing the salaries of their employees have made enormous profits, and there is no doubt, Mr. President, the revenues of our Government have not increased and our expenses have been increasing by leaps and bounds.

But, Mr. President, as an employer of labor, even if the profits of the business in which I employed them were not greater than they had been in the past, I never would want those employees paid less than the employees generally are paid throughout the country. I think it would be far better for the Government of the United States, if they can not reduce the appropriations in some other way for the year, at least to provide money to take care of the employees who we know must be suffering under present conditions.

I am not in favor, I will say to the Senator from Colorado, of making a horizontal increase in wages above a thousand dollars, because I believe that there will be no real suffering in the family of such an employee. I think under the conditions they have a pretty hard time to get along, but I am in favor, even though we have to raise the money in some other way, of taking care of the employees of the Government who are receiving less than $1,000 per annum.

As to the other question, whether they will be stimulated to better work and whether the merchants and the producers of this country, as soon as the increase is granted, will charge more for their products than enough to cover the increase, I do not believe, Mr. President, that that can be measured to a nicety. I recognize the fact that all the producers of the country, all the merchants of the country, all who conduct business, secure all for their products and as great a profit in their trading as it is possible for them to do. Of course, if they pass it on to the ultimate consumer, he is the one who finally pays. But the people affected by the amendment which I have offered can not help themselves. There is no question in the mind of the Senator but what they need more in order to purchase the bare necessities of life.

It has been suggested that there is no need of the Senate granting this increase, and no one should be influenced by the organized force of Government employees at present trying to compel us to do it. Mr. President, I take no notice of the effort of organizations to compel Congress to action. Whether it be of Government employees or whether it be any other employees, all the force that they can bring upon me does not deter me from doing what I think is proper and right.

Of course, I know my amendment is not what the employees think they are justly entitled to. If I thought the Government employees were forcing something that was not right, I would vote against them just as quickly as I have on nearly every occasion voted where there has been an organized force throughout the country to compel Congress to do the will of the organized body. I do not believe in that kind of legislation; I never will; and I am ready to go out of public life before I will submit to it.

Mr. President, parsimony is not economy. If we want to cut and economize, it is a mighty poor place to begin with the employees who are receiving less than they can live upon. We have heard here for a couple of days discussion as to child welfare and the money that we ought to appropriate for an examination into the causes of diseases of the child. Mr. President, if we want to take care of children, if we want to keep diseases from homes, if we want the children to have healthy bodies, they must have enough to eat and enough clothing to wear and enough fuel to keep them warm.

I know the amendment which I have offered is not extravagance; it is hardly doing justice to many of those who are covered. Mr. President, the Government employee is well taken care of in ordinary times, and if it were ordinary times I would oppose any increase, particularly in the condition we find the Treasury of the United States to-day.

But I can not bring myself to believe that it is right for Congress to say to the employees affected by this amendment, "We are not going to give you a cent increase in your salary, because we have not the money in the Treasury."

When I first made the statement in a public way that the Treasurer of the United States would find a deficit at the end of this fiscal year of $300,000,000, I was called to task by a good many men in public life and by the public press. I made that statement immediately after the Secretary of the Treasury had issued a statement that the deficit would be but $183,000,000. I went over all of the estimates that were made by the Secretary of the Treasury; I compared them with the appropriations of the last year; I knew what the income of the Government of the United States was likely to be under present laws, and I could not figure a deficit of any less than $300,000,000; and, Mr. President, before we get through with the appropriations of this session, I am quite sure the deficit will be nearer $400,000,000 than $300,000,000.

I know that this amendment will require a payment by the Government of $13,000,000. I sometimes think Congress spends money like drunken sailors, and we can pass an appropriation bill appropriating $150,000,000 without the batting of an eye or the discussion of an item, but I prefer to give these employees $13,000,000 and to cut the amount out of bills that will yet come before the Senate—items that can well afford to wait a year or, if necessary, two years, and nothing will be hurt thereby; the affairs of the Government will go on just the same; nobody will suffer; and I do know that such a course would appeal to the American taxpayers. Whether we agree to my amendment or not, I know that many of the items contained in the appropriation bills never ought to be appropriated for.

Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for me to take any more time of the Senate in the discussion of this question, but I sincerely hope and trust that the amendment which I have offered will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, inasmuch as the acting chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated that the pending amendment presents a question which is common to all the pending appropriation bills and involves, according to some estimates, an increase in our permanent expenses of $25,000,000, and according to others of $50,000,000, we can save time by determining upon our action with regard to this bill and in discussing the question as a general one, rather than as a mere amendment to the pending measure.

The proposition, as I understand it, in a general way is to provide for a horizontal increase, expressed in percentages, of the salaries of employees up to those receiving $1,800. The reason assigned for it is the increase in the cost of living and the consequent difficulty which many of the Government employees encounter in making both ends meet.

That, Mr. President, presents a proposition which has humanitarian aspects, strongly appealing to every well-constructed mind. Indeed, much of our so-called extravagances may be attributed to appeals to the emotions. In the presence of suffering, or possible suffering, confronted by conditions such as those eloquently pictured yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in discussing another amendment to this bill, our sentiments are apt to play traitor to our better judgment, and to prompt us to give the benefit of every doubt to a support of the measure. I should be less than human if I did not plead guilty to the same feeling, and yet we must consider, Mr. President—and I am stating nothing new in so asserting—and especially the Democratic Members of the Senate, who represent the majority and are in power, must consider our paramount duties and obligations as trustees of the Nation and of the Nation's affairs, and particularly of the Nation's revenues.

This may be hard to do; it certainly is not pleasant at all times; it is much easier to follow the lines of least resistance and to yield to situations which spare us the necessity of opposing wishes that are dear and hopes that are high in the breasts of others.

I have in times past attempted in my feeble way to sound a note of warning to my own associates when measures involving millions of dollars were before us for consideration and by outlining the inevitable conditions which now confront us. Of course, very little success has so far attended these efforts, but the situation now before us, Mr. President, and which is of our own creation, can not be longer avoided.

That we are face to face with a deficiency expressed in hundreds of millions of dollars admits of no question; that we are obliged to raise additional revenue by increased taxation or by resort to an issue of interest-bearing bonds, thus transferring the obligation to posterity, or that we shall be obliged to resort to both, is as certain as anything in the future can be. That the task of increasing taxes, already heavy and subject to just complaint, is a disagreeable one, and one which men fain would avoid if they could, is also a self-evident fact. Indeed, I sometimes observe that those who are most ready to vote for appropriations are the most reluctant to vote for revenue bills. Those most willing to spend the public moneys are frequently most unwilling to take the consequences, which is merely the exhibition of a common phase of human nature. But disagreeable tasks, although they may be postponed, can not be forever avoided; and the most disagreeable of all legislative tasks—that of increasing public taxation, whereby hundreds of millions of additional revenue must be acquired to take care of our threatened deficiency and to meet our ever-expanding appropriations—is inevitable. It must be done, and I hope it will be done at this session. I entertain but very little hope, however, that it will be done, since the difficulty of agreeing upon an adequate measure of revenue presents a task which, although not hopeless, is necessarily protracted.

Now, Mr. President, let us see just what our financial condition is in a general way. I shall refer to statements of gentlemen who occupy positions giving them authority to speak upon the subject. When this identical question was before the other House last December Mr. FITZGERALD, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, said:

> We have just witnessed the most remarkable spectacle in my experience in this House.

After referring to the action of the Committee on Rules, he states the proposed aggregate increase of salaries of employees under the then pending measure. He gives it in round numbers at $45,000,000, and then says:

> Mr. Speaker, other committees of this House besides the Committee on Appropriations have some responsibilities.
> I have heretofore referred to the fact that the estimates submitted to Congress disclose that there will be a deficit in the next fiscal year of $284,000,000, but that does not tell all. Within an hour I have received a message from the War Department stating that in order to continue making payments to dependent families of the National Guard now stationed on the border an appropriation of $8,500,000 additional is necessary to continue the payments from now until the 30th of next June. That is $8,500,000 not considered in estimating the probable deficit.

The House had suspended the rules and passed an act some time ago providing the sum of money for the purpose indicated. Mr. FITZGERALD continues:

> Other items will be submitted from time to time, of which we now have no knowledge; but it is clearly apparent that in the next fiscal year there will be a deficit in the Treasury in excess of $300,000,000. We can not get that money from the air. There is no plant that can furnish that money. It must come from the pockets of the taxpayers of the country. We must raise between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000 in the next fiscal year, and if we do not raise it by taxation we must get it by borrowing it on the credit of the Government. To borrow it would serve no useful purpose. It would merely be a temporary expedient, and it would not give that permanent increase in revenue which is imperative. With such a situation as that in the Treasury I am unwilling to take up for consideration propositions that may increase the financial burdens of the country and the predicted deficit anywhere from $45,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year.

That was upon the 16th of December. Upon the 19th Mr. RAINEY, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, addressed himself to the proposition, and I call the particular attention of the few Senators who seem to be sufficiently interested in the matter of Government expenditures and receipts to attend this discussion to what Mr. RAINEY had to say upon that occasion. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, I belong to that committee which is charged with the duty of suggesting bills to this House to pay the tremendous expenses of this Government. The London Economist five or six weeks ago contained a most interesting article estimating the amount of the budgets of the warring nations after the present awful war is ended. If the war ends one year from the 1st of next March, England will have an annual budget thereafter of $1,200,000,000, according to this publication. Germany will have a budget of $1,300,000,000; Austria-Hungary will have a budget of $1,400,000,000; Russia, with a budget always the largest in the world, will have a budget of $1,600,000,000.

These are colossal figures. The mind of man is too limited to grasp appreciably the enormity of the amounts expressed by these hundreds of millions of units, but we know that the last largest budget of the largest nation in the world in territory and in population is $1,600,000,000. Mr. RAINEY continues:

> I wonder if gentlemen who compose this body realize that for the year mentioned by the London Economist, for the fiscal year 1918, the expenses of this Government—and we have been in no war—will be $1,655,000,000, the largest budget in all the world, a larger budget than any nation in the world was ever compelled to meet. Increase the salaries of all these Government employees 10 per cent and you add to the expenses of this Government $60,000,000 every year. How are you going to meet it? The cry all over this country is, "Cut out the 'pork'!" and by "pork" they mean appropriations for public buildings; by "pork" they mean appropriations for rivers and harbors; by "pork" they mean appropriations for this Government's distribution of vegetable seed, and that is all. The average annual expenditure for public buildings for the last two decades amounts to $9,000,000. We spend $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 on rivers and harbors every year. Cut this out, cut both out, cut out the $250,000 which is expended for vegetable seed each year and you would have half of what these 500,000 Government employees are seeking to saddle on this country. I am not willing to see our rivers and harbors permitted to fill up and to discontinue entirely the expenditure of money for Government buildings in order that Government employees may have their demands on the Treasury satisfied. The real pork-barrel propositions with which this country is confronted are the demands of these Government employees on the Treasury. We have a deficiency staring us in the face. Gentlemen need not deny it.
> The deficiency in 1918 will amount to nearly $280,000,000.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] declares it will probably amount to $400,000,000, and he assumes to speak by the authority of experience and acquaintance with our methods of appropriations, both as to detail and as to aggregate; but it is a fact that the most modest estimate of the amount of this deficiency brings it perilously near the sum of $300,000,000.

How are you gentlemen going to meet this situation which is now here?

Let me ask the Democratic Senators here, how are you going to meet it? A revenue bill will soon be reported to the other House and will probably pass that body under rules which enable them to transact business expeditiously. Coming here we have the responsibility of considering it; we have the responsibility of passing or defeating it. The minority take part in this legislation; but yours is the responsibility and you will be charged hereafter, as you were charged in the last campaign by your adversaries, with every item of extravagance in which you indulge, including those which they introduced and advocated. We can not avoid the consequences; the minority may; and therefore it behooves us, from the standpoint of our duty as men in charge of the Government, from the standpoint of Democracy, which we mutually represent, and, above all, from the standpoint of economy, which we ought to represent, to scan these items very carefully and stand behind the committee whenever it indicates a purpose to invoke methods of frugality and economy in fiscal administration.

Mr. RAINEY continues:

> How are you gentlemen going to meet that when the time comes? Is the country going dry? Those who advocate nation-wide prohibition are boasting of the fact that Pennsylvania and Nevada are now the only really wet States in the Union. I am not discussing the moral question, but I am discussing the condition which will confront us when this country does go dry. If that should happen during the next year, an impossible premise though, we will be called upon by taxation to collect from some source or other $237,000,000 more in money each year thereafter.

In other words, the great question of prohibition carries with it a problem of revenue. When this country becomes prohibition in fact, our $237,000,000 of revenue derived from the traffic which is prohibited must be made up in some other way; and that means either added indirect taxation by way of a protective tariff or added direct taxation to be placed upon the wealth and the business and the property of the Nation. Of course the financial consequence of the adoption of a reform of nation-wide proportions and demanded by a majority of the people will not, and ought not, to stem the accomplishment of the reform; but men who have to administer the Government must take note of these things in determining how they shall appropriate public money, what for, and to what extent.

I read again:

> In other words, we are confronted right now in this country with the possibility of being compelled in the near future to levy more than $500,000,000 of new taxes. How are you going to do it?

That is the question for Democrats to answer. How are you going to meet it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator state from what document he is reading?

Mr. THOMAS. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 19 the remarks of Representative RAINEY, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means:

> How are you going to meet it? Restore the rates of the Payne-Aldrich bill? That is the proposal many of you make. You can not to save your life frame a tariff bill which will yield over $350,000,000 a year. Restore those oppressive rates and you will add to the present tariff law $100,000,000 in tariff taxes. If you restore this obnoxious stamp tax, you have only $33,000,000 more. Can you get it from taxing the large incomes more? Why, you have in this method of taxing reached the very highest notch. We tax large incomes now as much as any other civilized nation in the world ever attempted to tax them in time of peace.
> We are face to face with the proposition of lowering the income exemption to $1,000, and even if you do that also you will not raise this enormous sum of money. You can not progress here by proceeding along the line of least resistance. You can not conceal your head in the sand and flounder around here helplessly listening to the demands of 500,000 Government employees who want their salaries raised.
>
> I wish we could raise their salaries. I wish we could pay everybody more money. I wish this janitor mentioned by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] could get more money than he is receiving now. Is he getting any more or any less than janitors receive for similar service in other sections of this country and in private employment? If he is getting less, he ought to have more; if he is getting more, he ought to have less. That is the way to adjust these matters.

And so forth.

I have read, Mr. President, the remarks of these distinguished Members of the House because of their prominent positions upon two great committees of that body, because of the study they have given to these questions, and because of their consequent right to speak officially so that the Nation will listen; so that we may be apprised of our task.

Mr. President, I have been struck by one thing during my short career in the Senate. It is this: The developments of science during the past quarter of a century have been almost unlimited. During that period the world has progressed more rapidly than in the 10 centuries preceding it. We can to-day talk with Paris by wireless, and with Hawaii; every day we hold conversations with San Francisco; the internal-combustion engine has revolutionized our methods of travel; our implements of war are different in magnitude, in extent, and in their deadly character from those of a few years ago; business conditions have been systematized; the electric current has become the essential servant of civilization, all through the developments of the last few years. Yet no scientific men, no business men, none engaged upon problems of sociology or of legislation have yet been able to discover the point where economy can begin in our fiscal administration. It is impossible of location.

Whenever an attempt is made in this body or in the other House to minimize expenditures or to decrease appropriations, some one inquires, "Is this the place to begin? Are you not aware of the tremendous importance of the objects for which this appropriation is designed? Let us economize by all means, but do not let us begin here." Then when some other measure comes up and the same effort is made it meets the same argument, and we discover there no place for frugality. So we have gone down the line many times. Sometimes a new experiment in medicine or physics can "be tried on the dog," but here we are not even able to make that experiment. There is no place for it, although we all believe in it. This has been a dispiriting, disappointing, and discouraging thing to me whenever I have attempted to serve the constituency which I, in part, represent here by seeking to retrench in some direction.

Now, we are confronted by that situation in connection with this amendment. This is no place to begin. The price of living has risen; the needs of those living upon small salaries are extremely pressing, and we must, therefore, regardless of the general situation, spare the pruning knife in this direction, and not only spare it but add millions upon millions to the amount previously appropriated for this particular purpose, and try to save it in some other direction.

Mr. President, I should be opposed to this intended increase even if we could save it in other directions, because we would then have advanced twice as far along the road to economy as by a mere balancing of accounts, so to speak, through a shifting of appropriations. But does the Senator who suggested that [Mr. SMOOT] believe that it is possible to do so? Why, the other House, Mr. President, sent this bill over here by an overwhelming majority; it has also passed a public-buildings bill carrying an aggregate appropriation of $38,000,000. The minority vote against that bill was almost invisible. It takes a microscope to find it; and I should not be surprised if it passes the Senate with the usual added appropriations, and all attempts to defeat it will be met with the worn-out statement that "that is not the place to economize."

We have a rivers and harbors bill—somewhat diminished, I believe, in amount from that of last year—but we have that bill; they are coming in the same old way, the identical procession, gathering recruits, as the Senator suggests, from last year, knocking at our doors for passage, and each pleading that theirs is not the place to economize; we must begin somewhere else. Now, we must make a beginning somewhere.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asked me if I really thought the $13,000,000 could be saved in some of the appropriation bills that were coming over from the House.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that is, if this suggestion should be actually adopted and worked out.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. Mr. President, I believe it will be saved in the rivers and harbors appropriation bill; and I will tell the Senator why.

Last year, when the rivers and harbors appropriation bill carried some forty-odd million dollars, the Senator will remember that I offered an amendment to that bill providing for a total appropriation of $20,000,000, to be expended under the direct charge of the Engineer Board. We would have carried that amendment but for one vote.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and at the last presidential election you would have carried the United States but for one State. It is well enough to say what could have been done had the facts been different, or what the result would have been had they been different; but unfortunately, as the Senator knows, we did not adopt that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator, however, that I had every reason in the world to believe that when that amendment came to a vote it would be carried. Unfortunately one Senator absented himself from the Chamber, and that brought about the defeat of the amendment. But there was a sentiment in the Senate of the United States a year ago—and I believe that it has not decreased, but rather that it has increased—that the appropriations for rivers and harbors are not going to be made as they have been in the past. The rivers and harbors appropriation bill as it passed the House, if I remember correctly, carries $32,000,000, nearly $33,000,000. Now, why not cut that to $20,000,000 this year if we are going to pass it at all, or else not pass any of it, and let it take care of the $13,000,000 for these employees?

Mr. THOMAS. I want to assure the Senator that I voted against that bill then in toto, although I voted for every amendment that the Senator offered, and I am going to vote against it this time. I am following a pretty good lead in the matter of the rivers and harbors bill. I am now looking at the Senator who made such a gallant fight in the interest of economy there. But it is very hard for him to find any place for beginning to economize.

Mr. SMOOT. We have been gaining every year.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, have we?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Our appropriations are increasing. We shave off a little here and there. Take the few paltry millions, if you please, that could have been saved in that bill and then contrast it with nearly $700,000,000 voted enthusiastically by Republicans and Democrats for increased Army and Navy, which I also voted against! Mr. President, for that colossal appropriation we Democrats will be held responsible, although our Republican friends helped us not only in the passage of the bill but in the propaganda, if, indeed, they did not begin it. But in the ultimate the taxpayers will hold us responsible, and ought to hold us responsible, for yielding to the hysteria of the moment and in a blind agony of fear doubling the expenses of the Nation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I just wanted to ask the Senator if he anticipated that it would be very difficult now to prevent the passage of two or three bills, which in the aggregate would cover something over $100,000,000, at this session?

Mr. THOMAS. Would it be difficult?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I think so; yes.

Mr. JONES. I do not think so.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the Senator is right; but even a hundred millions is a trifle when compared to the deficiency which confronts us. We ought to cut deeper than that, in my judgment.

Mr. JONES. Oh, I agree with the Senator on that. I was simply referring to three bills that cover something like that amount, and possibly more.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, of course, I am aware that the amendment of the Senator from Utah does not cut as deep as the amendment of the House which has been stricken out by our committee; but it is thirteen millions, according to his estimate. Thirteen millions in these days do not amount to much when compared with the hundreds of millions that figure in these great appropriation bills; but several thirteen millions amount to a good deal, and it is the aggregate of the small amounts which constitutes the aggregate of our total expenditures. We are as apt, as legislators, to overlook that and seek to economize, if we economize at all, where large amounts are involved. We overlook the cumulative power of money. We forget that the great street car system of the city of New York, enormously developed and enormously patronized, depends for its revenues entirely upon 5-cent contributions, and that they accumulate very rapidly.

Mr. President, during the closing days of the last session the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and perhaps some others across the aisle occupied a good many hours of time in reading indictments of Democratic extravagance into the RECORD. The Senator from Michigan, if I recall rightly, declared that we had been spending money like drunken sailors. The Senator from Utah gave facts and figures for his statements. The Senator from Pennsylvania did the same. Of course, they were designed for campaign purposes fully as much as for arraignments of Democratic incompetency and extravagance. Nevertheless, they were largely true; and all we could do, if we did anything, was to minimize as far as possible the conclusions and the assertions then made.

When the Republican convention met in 1916 and adopted its national platform, it declared, among other things, that—

> The increasing cost of the National Government and the need for the greatest economy of its resources in order to meet the growing demands of the people for Government service call for the severest condemnation of the wasteful appropriations of this Democratic administration, of its shameless raids on the Treasury, and of its opposition to and rejection of President Taft's oft-repeated proposals and earnest efforts to secure economy and efficiency through the establishment of a simple, businesslike budget system, to which we pledge our support, and which we hold to be necessary to effect any real reform in the administration of national finances.

The Republican Party very properly, naturally, and logically took advantage of these conditions, and made the same charge against their opponents that their opponents made against them upon the same subject four years before; and in each instance each party told the truth. I hoped, Mr. President, after listening to some very fierce denunciations of my party, and reading others, during the last campaign regarding this subject, that if our friends, the enemy, were successful in the campaign then waging, they would inaugurate a budget or other system, and conduct the Government according to the best and most modern notions of efficiency coupled with economy; and I hoped that, if not successful, chastened by the experiences of a second defeat they would then unite in preaching and practicing economy, thus holding up to the world an example which we might follow, effectively although reluctantly. But, alas, Mr. President! I have as yet observed no such indications. There are a few brave voices on both sides that speak out in regard to this subject. But the lump has not yet been leavened, and, I am afraid, will not be very soon.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] two weeks ago had before the Senate a bill which he considered of great importance—and he was right, assuming his premises to be correct—which he wanted to pass as an obligation of the Government of the United States to some of its citizens. I have been unable to see that obligation. That bill called for an increased annual expenditure; we do not know how much, stated by some to be between three and four million dollars, and by others to be between twelve and fourteen million dollars. I did not feel then, and I do not feel now, that this is the appropriate time for such legislation; yet the measure received its chief support from those who preached economy in the last campaign.

I mention this in no invidious spirit, Mr. President, but merely as showing that we are pursuing the old and steady march of extravagance, all unconscious of the awakening that must come.

Now, let me refer to another feature of the present financial situation. Business is good. The profits made in private enterprises of all sorts are enormous. What we call "good times" are with us. Prosperity has come to us, bringing abundance upon her wings and scattering her bounties all over the country from one ocean to the other. We are living in a time of happiness and self-indulgence, not only in our governmental but in our business and social affairs, and acting as though it would continue forever. That is impossible, Mr. President. I think the crest has been reached and passed. The war must end by exhaustion of all the combatants, if for no other reason. The war will end in time, in any event, whether by treaty or by attrition; and with the close of the war, or with those changing fortunes which indicate the inevitable approach of a conclusion, different conditions will prevail all over the world, ourselves included; business affairs will be affected more easily and intensely in America, perhaps, than anywhere else, because unfortunately we have incorporated all forms of business in America, placed their shares upon the gambling markets, and used them as pawns of speculation. Hence, anything which even threatens a serious change one way or the other finds its expression in the stock markets, and then is reflected upon the actual business carried on by the various concerns there represented. As a result we shall have not hard times, I hope, but harder times than we are enjoying now, when taxation will rest more heavily upon the taxpayer, and when the people, grudgingly paying them and scrutinizing our administration of them, will very properly hold us responsible for all the ills they endure; and our good friends upon the other side will add fuel to that fire by noting the fact and pressing it home on every occasion.

Indeed, I observed during the last campaign that our extravagance was expressed in round figures frequently seldom less than fifteen or sixteen hundred million of expenditures by the last session, no deductions being made for those huge sums for ships and for men which in some degree we owe to the active agency and propaganda of Republican representatives in public life. In other words, we got no credit for it. I do not think myself that we deserved any; but we got no credit for it, and we shall get no credit for any of these things, no matter how well inclined you may be to them—not one. You may vote all the money you please for humanity's sake or through the influence of your emotions, but, whether you do it on your own account or through the pleadings of distinguished gentlemen famed for their eloquence upon the other side, you get no credit at all for it. The taxpayer makes no allowance, and should make no allowance, for those things.

I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet; but if the campaign of 1920 does not turn upon the extravagances of the last and of this and of the next Congress I shall be very agreeably disappointed. If it is not what we may call the burning issue then, the party to which I belong will be very lucky; and the only way in which I know how to avoid or even minimize that situation is to begin to practice what we have been preaching for years.

It seems to me that we have acted with regard to economy very much like the Irishman who said that he was "for the law, but against its enforcement." I do not know of a man within the hearing of my voice who does not believe in economy, who does not want to see it practiced, but who, nevertheless, does not feel that his own constituency have certain matters upon which they are pressing him to death and which must be considered here, and which can only be successfully considered by going in combination with others similarly situated; and then the appalling aggregate comes here to be enacted into law, and the party responsible and justly responsible for it must take the consequences.

If I were a member of the Republican Party, I might be in favor of these big appropriations. To my mind, their object is apparent. They are protectionists. The easiest and best way to tax a man is indirectly. If you can just hypnotize him, you can put your hand into his pocket and take what he has and he does not care much about it. Enormous expenditures mean necessarily an increase of revenues; and inasmuch as we must have them, how much easier it is to go back to the good old system of indirect taxation, increase the tariff, and take a man's property from him through processes of taxation, of the operation of which he is unconscious. In other words, it is a good way to restore the Payne-Aldrich bill and multiply it by two. Indeed, we have heard in the public press, we have heard from the lips of distinguished statesmen, we have heard from business men that prevailing financial conditions can be better met by an increase of our tariff duties than in any other way. The statement is, "You have got to come to it; why not take the easiest way?" I know Democrats in public life who seem to be willing to accept a system of taxation always abhorrent to the Democratic mind as an alternative to facing the music and levying direct taxes to meet our burdens. That leaven seems to be working where its existence was least expected.

I have been told that the suggestion was made in our Committee on Appropriations—not by a Republican, either—of a horizontal increase in our duties of a considerable percentage for the purpose of meeting this situation—a most welcome suggestion to some, but a most fatal one for Democrats who stop to consider a moment. We must continue a system of direct taxation, equalizing it as far as possible in order that the men who pay shall know what they are paying, thus arousing their interest in government and correcting its deficiencies through an alert and censorious public opinion.

Mr. President, politics has much to do with these expenditures on both sides. When it comes to politics, there is no more difference between a Democrat and a Republican than there is in their physical construction. We vote for many of these appropriations in order to secure the political influence to be derived from it. That is what we vote pensions for—Democrats and Republicans. I might mention other sorts of appropriations. The river and harbor bill is largely a matter of politics; and I have always understood that the term "pork," as used in regard to bills of that sort, has reference to the distribution of money in communities under a system of public improvements rather than to any individual benefit directly flowing from them.

Mr. President, it is very easy to pay our political debts with public money—the easiest thing in the world; a good deal more easy than to pay them out of our own pockets. But my experience has been through life that public moneys expended for political purposes seldom bear much fruit, and they ought not to. Yet we hug that sweet delusion to our souls, and go on in the old way, each party when it has the power, and both because they want to remain in power.

So we must begin, Mr. President, if we begin at all—we of the dominant party—to retrench our expenditures and reduce them wherever possible. We have a great naval program. It costs money. We have a great military program. It costs money. We are considering the question of universal military training as an absolute necessity to the Nation's future welfare and safety. The system will cost money—a great deal of money. Our relations with Mexico, whatever else may be said of them, are extremely expensive. They cost a great deal of money, and they will continue to cost a great deal of money. We have certain fixed expenditures, permanent in their character, which we must meet. They cost money. There are a great many other things which the Nation's interests require to be carried out, and these cost money.

I hope I am not guilty of parsimony, either in the consideration of large or of small appropriations; but I think that in all these things, whether they be large or whether they be small, at this time wherever a cent can be saved it ought to be saved; and much can be saved if we will give to our financial administration that attention which it deserves. Unfortunately, these bills come in at the end of the session, when we have but comparatively little time for their consideration. Hence they are rushed through, sometimes, without due regard to many indefensible things which they contain. Now, that is not a good way of legislating. This is wrong and wholly unjustifiable.

I have been reading lately, Mr. President—as have others, I have no doubt—the proposed methods of raising revenue to meet our deficiency. A bill is before the Committee on Finance which, among other things, if the public press be reliable, proposes to issue bonds to the extent, as I recall, of $280,000,000 to meet part of the necessary outlay for the fiscal year 1918. If we agree upon such a plan—and I certainly hope that we will not—I can not assume that they will be issued at less than 4 per cent.

Now, 4 per cent on $250,000,000 is $10,000,000, and that sum at the end of 50 years amounts to $500,000,000, or twice the amount of the principal. I do not suppose that bonds, if issued, will be issued for a shorter time. Shall we compel our posterity to bear the burden that belongs to us, and which we created in times of peace, of $250,000,000, and require them during the next 50 years to pay $500,000,000 by way of interest to those who own them, leaving the principal sum unpaid and uncanceled? Is that right, Mr. President? Yet is is easier than immediate taxation. Is it not more manly, more desirable in every way, to pay as we go, even though we may have to increase inordinately the burden of our taxation to meet our obligations? If we conclude to do so, it will be the best possible incentive to economy, since we all shrink from increasing direct taxes, and we all know the consequences of increasing them unduly.

Another misfortune with regard to some of our methods of raising taxes lies in the fact that we are too apt to pursue a method of class legislation to an extreme, and seemingly obnoxious to the old Democratic theory of "equal rights to all." I believe that the income-tax exemption should be lowered, and lowered very materially. I always have believed it. Yet this Congress will shrink from doing it lest it offend too many voters. I believe that we should repeal the present wholly unjust and indefensible tax upon oleomargarine and place a flat tax, say of 3 per cent, upon it, thereby enabling the people to obtain a perfectly nutritious and good food and the Government to obtain a revenue of five or six million dollars. I believe in putting the stamp tax back where it should be, upon all transfers of shares of stock in corporations, which would bring us, I think, nine or ten million dollars. I believe in a tax of at least 15 cents a gallon upon rectified spirits, which seems to have escaped pretty well so far, bringing us an added revenue of millions.

I think we should do these things along with proposed increases in other directions which may be perfectly proper, but which are not proper if we simply stop there and tax, even though unconsciously, in such a manner as to justify the complaint that we are levying taxes upon the people of the United States so as to offend as few voters as possible.

Now, Mr. President, so much for these general principles or general conditions as a basis for my support of the committee. There are, however, some other features of the situation to which I want to advert before I take my seat.

The civil-service employees of the United States have a life tenure of office. They continue to occupy their position during good behavior. They are not amenable to the fluctuating fortunes of political parties. They receive decent salaries, and behind those in office is a long waiting list of those who want positions, and are ready and anxious and eager to take the place of every employee who falls by the wayside.

The system has been defended ever since its advocacy began, and he would be a rash man to-day who indicated a desire to do away with it, certainly by doing away with it and returning to the one which it supplanted.

But, Mr. President, I recall some objections urged when the question of civil service was an acute one, which the present situation seems to verify. I read a speech, I think made in the early eighties, perhaps before that time, on this subject by one of the most distinguished statesman of the time, a man who adorned this Chamber with his presence and his eloquence for years, the great Senator from New York, Mr. Conkling. One of his objections to the system was that it would tend to the creation of an official caste, hardening into an organization and transforming itself from a body of servants to a body of masters, a situation which he denounced as intolerable to the institutions of America and to which any other system was preferable.

To-day we are confronted with an organization of the employees of the Government affiliated with labor organizations in the great American Federation, represented before committees by able delegates devoting their entire time to the enactment of this measure, and perfectly competent to defend it and to assert their right to it.

That in itself is not reprehensible, and yet, Mr. President, to me a lobby is a lobby, whether it is an organization of manufacturers, of physicians, of lawyers, of suffragettes, of labor, or of officeholders, and we who have denounced lobbies and who have flattered ourselves with having discovered and destroyed a formidable one should be the last to recognize or to tolerate conditions which are similar, if not identical, the great and perhaps the only difference being the nature of the objects to be accomplished by the organization rather than the inherent character of the movement itself. Frankly I think it is a situation which, if successful, will lead to further and still further demands upon us, for these are demands, presented in a way that justifies some of the apprehensions which found lodgment in the minds of great men years ago.

Mr. President, my chief reason for mentioning this situation is that shortly after the action of the committee upon the pending bill as to this particular feature was made public the press of Washington announced that this organization proposed to resist other appropriations; that it proposed to obstruct the legislation of the Congress of the United States in other directions regarding other expenditures, if their demands could not be satisfied. In other words, the organized forces of Federal employees to-day are at their desks—who in the aggregate receive, I think it was stated, from 25 to 30 per cent better wages than are paid by private employers, whose places would be readily taken by the multitude of those who have passed the examinations and who are wating for fortune to come to them—having behind them the tremendous power of the organization with which they are affiliated, announce their purpose to oppose legislation of the Congress of the United States because they can not compel us to give what they demand. This is a grave situation.

I had no other reason than this for supporting the committee with my vote. I do not think the time has yet come—certainly, I hope we have not reached it—when the organized employees of the United States can demand of Congress certain action and threaten it with certain other action if that demand is not granted. If we once break over such a line and establish a precedent, we must take the consequences.

I have received during the past fortnight what might be called identic notes—that is to say, letters and telegrams just alike—coming from different parts of the country and particularly from my own, from Government employees, some of them urging, some of them requesting, some of them demanding my support of this proposed increase. My answers have brought replies of a somewhat intolerant character occasionally, which of course is in line with the announced policy of the public servants.

Some time ago, Mr. President, a great English historian, Mr. Froude, in one of his interesting essays upon the situation in England, I think it was in the early sixties, referring to a similar tendency of civil service there, used this language:

> The competitive examination system is the model of modern progress. We believe ourselves to have found it the most perfect method of sifting out our own best men. The experiment, it is true, has been tried among the Asiatics in China for a thousand years, and has produced the weakest and most corrupt government which the world has ever seen.

Of course, it is not to be inferred that our experiences will be that of China, but it is significant, Mr. President, that among those who doubt the principle of government by democracy, who mistrust the people and feel that they are not capable of governing themselves, is the argument that officers and offices always tend to multiply in republics, and as they increase in numbers they make demands at first generally, in the end perhaps always, make demands which are complied with because they are an organized power, because they may hold the balance of power, and because they are in a position to demand action and enforce their requests by the threat of reprisal.

Much criticism was made during the last campaign of the Democratic majority in Congress of their alleged surrender to the demands of four men as to an item of grave and serious legislation. Passing the question as to the soundness or unsoundness of the charge, does not a request become a demand when it is accompanied, or at least seems to be, by a statement that its denial will be followed by proposed hostile acts directed against other matters of financial legislation which may come up for consideration, which we may be obliged to enact into law in the discharge of our duty?

So, Mr. President, I am unwilling under the circumstances, independent of the question of economy, to commit myself to a movement of which I can not see the ultimate consequences.

But, Mr. President, there is another feature of this matter which I want to refer to before taking my seat, and I shall occupy but a few moments more. It has reference to the character of the relief as a practical measure. Whenever prices rise the man who receives fixed compensation suffers. Whenever prices fall the individual receiving fixed compensation prospers. In the days of the agitation for free silver, when times were hard and money scarce, the salaried employee was in good material condition, because the scarcity of money and the hardness of the times increased its value, and through the increase of value prices fell. Conversely, of course, the proposition is equally true, and much of the rise in the cost of living may be traced directly to the abundance of gold in this country, every dollar of which represents from $5 to $7 of credit, and the decrease in its value is reflected in prices.

So, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] said this morning, we must not forget in our consideration of this question that it has another side to it, and when that side presents itself the particular class of people are the fortunate and not the unfortunate class, and fixed employment and fixed compensation give them a position so superior to the private employee as to account in a measure for the fact that these places are sought with so much avidity and held so constantly.

But, Mr. President, if the fact were otherwise, I should question the wisdom of this increase. It is not the way to meet the situation, in my judgment. We can not increase salaries as rapidly as the merchants of the country can increase prices.

Something has been said about the many rises in the compensation of men in private employment during the last year or two, the aggregate amount of which is enormous, and which could have been made, and perhaps made more liberally, because of the enormous profits which these private enterprises have been enjoying. But, Mr. President, I think I might inquire whether these increases have really brought any added compensation to those who receive them. Has not the constant rise in the price of necessities of life been greater in proportion than the rise in compensation? If I mistake not, such are the facts as outlined in the economic papers of the country. I would venture the assertion with some degree of confidence that if the House provision remains in the bill and becomes a law 30 days will not elapse before the purveyors of the necessities of life in the District of Columbia and elsewhere will regulate their prices so as to absorb the increase. I think that is a fact which economic history will demonstrate to be true; and if it is true, then do we not by adopting this policy increase instead of discourage this constant rise in the prices of the necessities of life? Do we not feed it instead of fighting it, and is not that bound to be the result?

Mr. President, I sympathize, earnestly and sincerely and humanely, with every man and woman of this country who in these times of abundance are living, so to speak, upon short rations. I would to God there was no such thing as suffering or indigence in America. It makes me sometimes ashamed of my country when I read of the orgies of the rich in our great metropolitan centers the prodigious extent of their luxury and sometimes of their debauchery, and then contrast those things with the needs of the poor and the deserving. I hate to see these inequalities, because they are breeders of discontent, and discontent is always the precursor of revolution. But they are here and they are largely responsible for the conditions which make consideration of this measure at all necessary.

I believe there are, Mr. President, many very unjust inequalities in our compensation of employees. I have no doubt that many of them are poorly paid and that others are perhaps overpaid. But the way to regulate that, Mr. President, is to institute systematically and properly an investigation and then equalize these conditions after we know the extent to which they exist and the extent to which they ought to be equalized. I am heartily in favor of that. I think it ought to be done by all means.

I am as much surprised as the Senator from Iowa at the statement of the Senator from Utah regarding the minimum wages which a great many people are receiving. I was more surprised that a man would consent under any circumstances in these times to work for any such compensation, because if we are to believe what we read and what we are told, the demand for labor now everywhere is far in excess of the supply, and why an able-bodied man should work for the Government for $450 when by going to Baltimore or Philadelphia or to the other great industrial centers he can get far more than that, and get it easily, it is difficult for me to understand. There may be good reasons, probably are, why this is not done. I fully agree that is a sum upon which a family man can not live decently. Before we attempt to equalize those conditions, let us take a probe and ascertain what they are, their depth, their extent, and then act with that intelligence which comes from information.

I hope, Mr. President, that those of us on this side of the Chamber upon whom rests the obligation and the responsibility of the Government will stand by their committee in their commendable efforts to prevent these increases of our permanent expenditures, for we know, Mr. President, that, although this bill only extends over the period of the fiscal year provided in its recital, the precedent once established can not easily be gotten rid of. It is there; it is there to stay. Because we have done it once will be the conclusive reason why we should do it for all time. In other words, it is easy to enter upon any system of legislation; far more easy than it is either to restrict or abandon it afterwards by retracing our steps.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not he has investigated the matter enough to know that any man was working for $450 a year—who does a whole day's work I mean?

Mr. THOMAS. I have made no investigation, I will say to the Senator; but my statement was based upon the assertion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which perhaps the Senator from Nebraska did not hear.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have been told that those receiving that pay are either boys in their teens—messengers, and so on—or that they are men who only work a few hours a day. Personally I have never investigated the matter.

Mr. THOMAS. The understanding of the Senator from Nebraska and the statement of the Senator from Utah justify my contention that we ought to have accurate information about these matters before we proceed to general legislation concerning them.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that I know there are men working in the Government service to-day who are receiving less than $480 a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How many of them are there, where are they, and what are they doing?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suppose every member of the subcommittee knows what those men are doing. They are men who are hired, for instance, to work in the Botanic Garden, and they are limited to a certain amount per day. I know there are such men; I know their representative appeared before the committee and appealed for an increase; but those having the affairs of the department in charge advised not to increase the salaries of those men. I know that there are assistant messengers who are receiving not more than $480 per year—$40 per month. As I previously stated to the Senator from Nebraska—I think it was he who asked me the question——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Utah state in what department and where there is an assistant messenger—a grown man—getting only $480 a year?

Mr. SMOOT. In the Pension Office, I will say to the Senator, and also in the Patent Office.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The assistant messengers' roll of the Pension Office carries a salary of $60 a month.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I have the bill here, and can refer to it very quickly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And so do those in the Patent Office.

Mr. SMOOT. In the Patent Office the law provides for 14 messengers. Those are the regular messengers. The salary of the regular messengers is $840, which is $70 a month.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, it has 25 assistant messengers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am talking about assistant messengers in the Patent Office now; that is what you said.

Mr. SMOOT. Laborers provided for on the statutory rolls receive $660 per annum, which is $55 a month. That is, where laborers are appropriated for and no salary mentioned. Then, 14 laborers—under the head of laborers—at $600. Then there are 42 laborers, at $540. Those laborers are men; they are not boys. I will state to the Senator that there are 40 messenger boys, at $420 each.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Those are messenger boys. They are not assistant messengers.

Mr. SMOOT. Those are messenger boys in the Patent Office; and, Mr. President, out of every lump-sum appropriation in every department there are laborers who are used as messengers during times when they can not be used for anything else. So it has been stated before the committee; and they are receiving $40 a month; that is, at the rate of $480 a year.

I will also say to the Senator that not only is that true in the Patent Office, but I think it is true in other bureaus of the Interior Department. It is true of the Pension Office, and I think in every other department of the Government where laborers are employed and paid out of lump-sum appropriations. I do not believe there is a department in the Government but what employs men at $40 a month.

Mr. OVERMAN. Congress does not fix these salaries. Congress only provides where the man shall be employed and gives a lump sum.

Mr. SMOOT. I admit that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator will agree with me; but, talking about laborers here in the District, Col. Harts said it was not necessary to increase their salary; that they could be secured at that price, and just as many as were wanted.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not name Col. Harts, but I did say, "a man having the employment of men in charge"; but I will say frankly, as the Senator has mentioned the name, that it was Col. Harts. I stated that the men who are getting $1.65 a day appeared before the committee and wanted an increase, but when Col. Harts appeared before the committee he said there was no necessity for the increase, because he had more applications than he could take care of, and that he could get many times the number of employees that were required. I will say that in the pending legislative appropriation bill there are employees of the Government provided for receiving salaries to the amount of $361,561 at $480 each per annum and less.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not catch the Senator's last statement.

Mr. SMOOT. In the legislative appropriation bill, which we now have before us, the amount of salaries paid to employees of the Government at less than $480 per year is $361,561, and, according to the Book of Estimates, in all other appropriation bills that will be enacted for the fiscal year 1918 the appropriations will amount to $10,673,245, or a total in the legislative bill and all other bills of $11,034,806.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, let us see what the facts turn out to be. The Senator from Utah cited the Interior Department and the Patent Office. Did he find assistant messengers at less than $720 a year? No; but he found messenger boys at $480.

Mr. SMOOT. I find laborers here——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will come to that in a moment. I first took issue with the Senator about assistant messengers. The assistant messenger gets $60 a month, and the messenger gets $70 a month. They obtain the places through civil service now. Splendid boys could be brought here from the interior who would be delighted to come—boys between 18 and 20 years of age—and occupy these places, for they would have ample time to pursue their studies at night and an opportunity to obtain an education.

Further, the Senator found no assistant messenger at less than $60 a month, but he found messenger boys at $480 a year. I am familiar with that class of boys. They are boys between 12 and 16 years of age, who run errands during the day and go to school at night. It is excellent pay for them and much more than they would get in a store. Besides, it gives them an opportunity to make a livelihood.

The Senator cites laborers in the Patent Office. I will ask him if he has investigated as to those laborers and ascertained who the majority of those laborers are? The majority of those laborers are girls who dust the machinery in the Patent Office, the patent exhibits, and most of them receive about $50 a month, which is vastly better pay than they would get in any of the stores, and they occupy vastly better places than shop girls in the stores. They are not men; they are not heads of families, as a rule. Those places were much sought after when I was familiar with the work of that office. Those employees are called upon to do only light work; their occupation is an easy one. There may be some male laborers who are paid $50 a month, but the average laborer who contributes nothing but manual labor and no brain to his work can not get that amount anywhere else. I wish I could get a place of that sort for two or three colored men I have in mind now who would like the work. I should like to get them a place paying $40 a month. I have one in whom I am interested right now who would be delighted to get a place at $40 a month. If we are paying $50, when all over the city they are begging for such places at $40, it is not a hardship we are putting on them. It is not the kind of condition that the Senate is really supposing it to be. The man works and his wife works. I wish nobody had to work; I wish everybody could be provided for without hard work, at any rate.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I mean I wish nobody was obliged to work to make a living; I wish everybody could live without work. I do not wish that no one had to work, because if no one had anything to do, if none of us had anything to do, I for one would be utterly miserable.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the greatest blessing that God has conferred upon His children is the blessing of having a chance to work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I really meant by that was that I regret that anybody is obliged to work for $50 a month and can make no more for a living; that is really what I meant. I wish everybody might have a better living than $50 a month affords.

Mr. SMOOT. I will agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With great pleasure I helped pass the agricultural-extension work bill and with great pleasure I expect to report to the Senate in a day or two the vocational education bill, and I hope through it we will help prepare the children better than their fathers have been prepared; that we will help prepare the boys better than their fathers have been prepared, that they may have a creative power and a mental and physical skill and will be so situated that they can produce for themselves more than their fathers produced in the past; but when we come down to these $50-a-month places, to the laborers receiving $600 a year in the Patent Office, we find that they are girls, as a rule. The bulk of them are girls who dust the machines.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that, if he will read this bill, he will find that wherever there is a laborer provided for, if the place is to be filled by a female, the bill says "female laborer, at $300 or $480," as the case may be. I will just run through some of the items here. For the Bureau of Education, for instance, it will be found that provision is made for so many female laborers and so many laborers at $480, and the same thing will hold good as to the other departments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We were discussing the Patent Office, with which I am quite familiar.

Mr. SMOOT. Turn to any of the other departments, the Department of Commerce, for instance, and we find authorization for so many laborers—that means, of course, at $70 a month, or $840 a year—and then it goes on and says:

Fourteen laborers (including one transferred from Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce); two laborers, at $480 each.

That is $40 a month. I desire to say to the Senator that such items run all through the bill. As I have said, the number receiving less than $480 is small compared to those who receive from $480 to $1,000, because the amount in this bill provided for all employees receiving between $480 and $1,000 is $5,113,375, as against only $361,516 for those receiving less; and in all the other appropriation bills for employees paid between $480 and $1,000, the total is $110,281,300, as compared with only $10,673,245 for those paid $480 and less. So the percentage of those paid between $480 and $1,000 a year is greater than the percentage of those receiving less than that amount.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, when we take the department in Washington selected by the Senator from Utah and the facts are presented, it is ascertained that he was mistaken about assistant messengers getting less than $720 a year.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, I will say to the Senator because the statutory rate is fixed for assistant messengers; and in looking over the bill I never noticed in hurriedly reading it that the item was for messenger boys; but I want to say to the Senator that what we were discussing was as to whether there were laborers employed by the Government of the United States who received only $480 a year; and again I say that there are laborers, men with families, who are receiving no more than that amount in the Government service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the Senate is paying its laborers in the Senate Office Building $480 a year, and there is a large list of men begging for the places. What do they do? They go on duty for three or four hours at night. So it will be found that in these places where the employees are paid $480 a year there are explanatory circumstances which make the compensation good pay, just as it will be found that in the Patent Office the places on the regular laborers' roll at $60 a month—provided for by a regular appropriation, specifying so many laborers, without naming females at all—the places are filled largely by girls. Such provisions have been carried for the Patent Office for years; and, although they provide nominally for laborers, the places are filled by girls, who, as I have said, dust the machines. There are quite a large number of them doing the very lightest and easiest kind of work for about six hours a day. What I am insisting upon is that we ought not to be swept away by the mere suggestion that we have certain cheaply paid employees on our rolls receiving $480 a year, or $40 a month, when, as over in the Agricultural Department, for instance, those receiving that amount are boys who work a few hours a day and go to school at night. For such work that is ample pay, as is $25 a month for little fellows 12 years old who work only a few hours a day, which is the pay that some of them receive out of lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, take the Congressional Library. I know of young men who are going to school at the George Washington University at night who for the full hours of work which they put in at the Library are paid only $35 a month.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As to the Library, we have left such matters entirely to the Librarian. We do not classify the pay of employees there; it is subject to change, and that is not an ordinary Government department where we fix the pay. I frankly find in the Library a class of pay that is to me really surprisingly low.

Mr. SMOOT. I know of young men employed there, married men who have families, and who have come to Washington to receive an education, and they are working just as many hours as any other employee in any other department of our Government; and, as I stated before, they are only receiving $35 a month.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is in the Library, the Senator says?

Mr. SMOOT. In the Library.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We should take up the Library, then, and take charge of the compensation there. It is immediately under Congress. It is our Congressional Library.

Mr. SMOOT. All of the other salaries of all the departments are immediately under our control.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Library of Congress is especially responsible to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Not more than any other department of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes; it is. There is no member of the Cabinet over it. The Joint Committee on the Library nominally controls it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator says that the salaries in the Library are fixed by the Librarian and that we have nothing to do with them. I notice here, on page 23 of this bill, in the Catalogue, Classification, and Shelf Division, 13 assistants to the chief of the division at $600 each and 4 at $540 each. That is provided for right here in the bill. Then on page 22——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Do we fix in detail in the bill now the compensation of all these people in the Library?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; just the same as in the other departments; but in that department, as in every other department, they have a lump sum, and most of the low salaries paid are paid from that lump sum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what I meant.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the fault of the man in charge of the lump sum, then. We fix a certain standard of pay, and the lowest is $480.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are no such low figures as $35 a month in the salaries we fix. That is assigned from the lump sum.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it is not a statutory salary, and the $35 a month is not provided for specifically in the appropriation, but it is paid from a lump sum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should have qualified my first statement in that way. While we fix the compensation of some of the employees, what I really meant was that $35 a month was not a statutorily fixed compensation.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. JONES. We do fix some salaries in this bill, however, at $45 a month.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and we fix salaries at $20 a month.

Mr. JONES. I refer to those in the Library.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Brandegee	Hughes	Nelson	Sterling
Bryan	Husting	Norris	Stone
Chamberlain	James	Oliver	Thomas
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Thompson
Clark	Jones	Poindexter	Tillman
Colt	Kenyon	Pomerene	Townsend
Cummins	La Follette	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Curtis	Lane	Reed	Walsh
Fernald	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Watson
Fletcher	Lewis	Sheppard	Weeks
Gallinger	Lippitt	Shields	Williams
Gronna	Lodge	Smith, Ga.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness and is paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word by way of explanation of the vote I am about to cast.

I believe in real economy. I know, however, there are things named economy which are entirely false. It is to me an improper thing for the Government to retain in its employ men and women at less compensation than they ought to receive, and yet I know that it is doing that thing. I regret, however, that the present amendment is so worded and comprehends the subject in such a manner that I can not support it.

I know that there are men and women in the employ of this Government who are overpaid—that is, they are performing no really valuable service to the Government—and if we had the courage to go into the matter carefully we would eliminate from the Government service a great many of these people who are now being gratuitously supported out of the Public Treasury. This amendment rewards the worthy and the unworthy alike. It simply pays to a man who is now receiving more than he ought to receive an additional wage. It is unfair to the employees who actually render service, and no one has even estimated the number of these unworthy employees.

I repeat that I think it is false economy to keep anybody in the employ of the Government at less than that person's service is worth; and if you will bring to me an individual case and show to me that that person is not receiving what he ought to receive, I will vote to increase his salary, as I have always voted for such increases. But if you bring them in block, and say: "We are going to raise good, bad, and indifferent in the same manner," then I can not support your proposition, because

I am here to represent my constituents, who help to pay these bills, and I will not knowingly do as their representative what I would not do for myself.

That being true, I can not conscientiously vote for an increase of salaries indiscriminately, without any consideration at all of the worth of the employee. It is admitted that hundreds of superannuated, incapable clerks are being carried on the pay rolls because there seems no way to separate them from the service. Certainly it is not right to increase their salaries and at the same time grant no greater wage to the men and women who actually do the Government's work. We should reward according to merit, and thus encourage capable and efficient service. The pending amendment, like the House provision, is unfair to the clerk who serves the Government efficiently and to the people, who have a right to demand that their money shall be properly expended. Not a Senator here would adopt the principle of this bill in dealing with his own employees. What right has he to adopt it for his Government?

It is for this reason, Mr. President, that I am compelled to vote against the proposition and not because I am opposed to paying men and women what their services are worth, regardless of what is paid outside. Indeed, I think the Government ought to set the example of paying what its employees are actually worth. Segregate the Government employees and reward them according to the services rendered. By doing this thousands would receive increased salaries, thousands would be discovered to be amply paid now, and thousands more would be either demoted in salary or dropped from the pay roll entirely. To secure efficient service, the Government must reorganize and reward its servants according to merit. The depleted condition of the Treasury would not deter me from voting adequate compensation to deserving employees, for to a great extent a repletion of that Treasury depends upon the efficiency and worth of those employees, and the Government, of all employers, should be the most just; but to reward the incompetent equally with the competent is unwarranted, whether the Treasury be empty or full.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. There may be something in what the Senator says in the case of salaries that are above $1,000; but does the Senator believe that in making a horizontal increase of 10 per cent in the salaries of employees receiving less than $1,000 there is going to be any great injustice to the Government? Does he not believe that there will be very few cases, where the man is receiving less than $1,000, where the increase is not justified?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I happen to know that there are in the employment of this Government many men and women who were put in through political influence, who ought not to be in the service at all. They are detrimental rather than beneficial, and I want to separate those, if I can, from the people who are properly in the service, and who ought to be adequately compensated for services rendered. Now, I know that there will be hundreds of employees included under this provision who are not entitled to a cent of increase. Indeed, they should be demoted or excluded. They ought to be separated from the service and placed upon their own resources, instead of being carried as a burden upon the people.

Now, this is a fact. There is no way to disguise it. We all know it is so, yet we propose in this blanket way to cover good, bad, and indifferent with this provision and reward all alike with improvident hand. Present the individual or classes of cases to us so that we can understand their merits and then I will gladly join with any others to adequately reward those servants who are properly performing their duties to the Government. I can not consent to this reckless way of discharging public duty.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should be glad to vote for this provision as it is in the House bill. I feel satisfied, however, that that provision will be rejected when it comes to a vote upon it. For that reason, if I were at liberty to vote to-day, I would vote for the amendment presented by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], feeling that that is the very best that there is any chance of getting.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from Utah will be voted down. As I said, there will be some differences to compose between the House and the Senate, perhaps somewhat in line with the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah. Whether we will have time to do it or not, I do not know. The Senate committee did not have the time to do it and get these appropriation bills through; but when we get into conference it may be settled. That is, if the Senate will stand by the committee, the matter will go into conference, the House being for the horizontal increase up to $1,800 and the Senate for nothing. Of course there will be a composition of differences between the two Houses; and I hope we will arrive at something that will be equitable and just.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated again? Some of the Senators have not heard it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the committee amendment, as it appears on page 151, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 7. That to provide, during the fiscal year 1918, for increased compensation at the rate of 15 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate per annum of $480 or less, and for increased compensation at the rate of 10 per cent per annum to employees who receive salaries at a rate of more than $480 per annum and not exceeding $1,000 per annum, so much as may be necessary is appropriated: Provided, That this section shall only apply to employees who are appropriated for in this act specifically and under lump sums, or whose employment is authorized herein: Provided further, That detailed reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next session showing the number of persons, the grades or character of positions, the original rates of compensation, and the increased rates of compensation provided for herein.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in the Committee on Appropriations I voted for this amendment, but after the assurance given by the acting chairman of the Senate committee I shall have to vote against the amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to know whether we have an assurance from the chairman of the committee that after we have rejected this House provision the conferees deliberately promise that they will yield in conference?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; Mr. President, I do not make any promise at all.

Mr. CLAPP. If not, what does the observation of the Senator from South Carolina mean?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not make any promise at all. I said that the House is insisting on a large horizontal salary increase for all employees up to $1,800. Then, if the House insisted, and the Senate insisted upon its amendment, I said there was bound to be a composition of differences between the two Houses, and there might come from it an adjustment that would be equitable and right. That is what I said.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senate adopts my amendment, it certainly can not be lower than the amendment I have offered.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, that is the same horizontal increase business, which does right to some and wrong to others. I am opposed to any sort of horizontal increase. I am opposed to increasing the salary of some man who is 75 or 90 years old, while some bright, active young man gets no salary at all. The man who is 80 years old, who sits looking out of the window all day, gets an increase, while the man who has worked day in and day out gets nothing.

I am opposed to this horizontal increase in any form. I think the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is right. If we could work out some system by which some men who are getting too much could be reduced, and some men who are not getting enough could be increased, that would be a different proposition. The Senator from Utah knows that we came across some men who ought to have been increased and some who ought to have been reduced, but we could not go into that question. It was impossible. So we struck out this amendment. We opposed these horizontal increases.

Mr. SMOOT. The House provision provides a horizontal increase, and if the employees of the Government, no matter what rate they are getting, will get any increase at all, that is the only way they can get it at this short session of the Congress. It is for only one year, and I hope the Senator will join in making some provision for an examination into the salaries paid in all the departments of the Government. He knows as well as I know that there are many of them receiving more than they ought to receive. But my amendment does not touch that class of employees. The $1,000 man and below are the only ones affected by my amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the investigation is going on now, as the Senator knows. The Senator from Utah is interested in the amendment here from the Post Office Department proposing a report by this Efficiency Board. We provided for that, and the activities of that board we provide shall be increased in this bill. The Senator himself brought in an amendment here which was in the line of economy and doing justice to those men who deserve larger salaries and reducing the salaries of those who are doing nothing, and whose services are not worth a cent to the Government. That is what we can do next year. I say I think we ought to strike out all of this section, and then let it go to the House and see if we can work out anything in conference.

Mr. JONES. The Senator said there might be a compromise if we would strike out the provision put in by the House. Does the Senator infer that they would bring in anything in the nature of a compromise covering specifically named officers of the Government?

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not say that. I said——

Mr. JONES. I can not see any other form of compromise that could be brought about.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not going to propose any compromise now, because I think we ought to strike out the section. It is a horizontal increase, and if we strike it out the House conferees will then know our position. I expect the House conferees will insist on the section, and if they insist and the Senate conferees refuse to accede, then there is bound to be a composition, if we are to have any bill at all; and if we are to have a bill, the two Houses can probably get together.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah is an amendment to the House text. Can it be offered as a substitute for the Senate committee amendment when the Senate committee amendment simply strikes out certain language in the House bill? Is it not true that the amendment of the Senator from Utah is an amendment to the text of the House bill, and that if it is adopted then the committee amendment will still come before the Senate to strike out then the amendment of the Senator from Utah instead of the House text?

Mr. SMOOT. I offered the amendment by way of a substitute to perfect the House provision. That can be done by an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but I do not see how it can be a substitute for the committee amendment to strike out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is an effort on the part of the Senator from Utah to correct the text before the Senate committee amendment to strike out is voted upon.

Mr. NORRIS. That is my understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair understands. The yeas and nays have been requested on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. DU PONT'S name was called). I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. Were the Senator from Delaware present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. In his absence I shall be obliged to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness. I have consented to pair with him for the day. Therefore I can not vote. If permitted to vote on this amendment for the reason I stated a while ago, I would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Upon this subject I am paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARK (when Mr. WARREN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is detained from the Senate by illness and is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP (after having voted in the affirmative). When my name was called I transferred my pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and voted. Since then the senior Senator from California has entered the Chamber and voted. I am therefore obliged to withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted, but I am compelled to withdraw my vote, as the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a pair, is not in the Chamber.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Borah	Gronna	McCumber	Smoot
Brady	Husting	McLean	Sterling
Brandegee	Kenyon	Martine, N. J.	Thompson
Chamberlain	La Follette	Nelson	Watson
Clark	Lane	Oliver	Weeks
Colt	Lee, Md.	Phelan	Works
Curtis	Lewis	Pittman
Fernald	Lippitt	Pomerene
Gallinger	Lodge	Sherman

NAYS—29.

Ashurst	James	Saulsbury	Tillman
Bankhead	Johnson, Me.	Shafroth	Townsend
Beckham	Myers	Sheppard	Vardaman
Bryan	Norris	Shields	Walsh
Cummins	Overman	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Fletcher	Poindexter	Smith, S. C.
Hollis	Ransdell	Stone
Hughes	Reed	Thomas

NOT VOTING—34.

Broussard	Gore	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Catron	Harding	Newlands	Smith, Mich.
Chilton	Hardwick	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Clapp	Hitchcock	Owen	Swanson
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Underwood
Dillingham	Jones	Penrose	Wadsworth
du Pont	Kern	Robinson	Warren
Fall	Kirby	Simmons
Goff	Lea, Tenn.	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. SMOOT'S amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to have the question stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment is to strike out the section which has just been modified by the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. LIPPITT. How would that leave the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If agreed to, it would leave the bill without the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does a vote in the affirmative sustain the committee's amendment as amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands, not having seen the bill, but the Chair thinks he is right, that the committee propose to strike out section 7. The Senator from Utah moved to amend section 7 before the committee amendment was put. The amendment of the Senator from Utah was carried. Now the committee amendment comes up to strike out section 7, which is in reality the amendment of the Senator from Utah. If the motion is sustained, it has just the same effect as though the original amendment was carried. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. I desire to state that if the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] were present and I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent, for which reason I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and withhold my vote in his absence.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made on the last ballot with respect to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Ashurst	James	Saulsbury	Thomas
Bankhead	Johnson, Me.	Shafroth	Tillman
Beckham	Myers	Sheppard	Townsend
Bryan	Newlands	Shields	Vardaman
Fletcher	Overman	Smith, Ga.	Walsh
Hollis	Ransdell	Smith, S. C.	Williams
Hughes	Reed	Stone

NAYS—36.

Borah	Gallinger	Lodge	Poindexter
Brady	Gronna	McCumber	Pomerene
Brandegee	Husting	McLean	Sherman
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Clark	La Follette	Nelson	Sterling
Colt	Lane	Norris	Thompson
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Oliver	Watson
Curtis	Lewis	Phelan	Weeks
Fernald	Lippitt	Pittman	Works

NOT VOTING—33.

Broussard	Gore	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Catron	Harding	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Chilton	Hardwick	Owen	Swanson
Clapp	Hitchcock	Page	Underwood
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Jones	Robinson	Warren
du Pont	Kern	Simmons
Fall	Kirby	Smith, Ariz.
Goff	Lea, Tenn.	Smith, Md.

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand that that leaves the House text just as it came to the Senate.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no!

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the committee amendment has been defeated; the substitute was not adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; the substitute was adopted.

Mr. LODGE. The substitute was adopted and retained.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was retained; but the item, as I understand, as stricken out by the committee was amended on motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The House provision was perfected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Smoot amendment, as it is called, remains in the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina in charge of the bill whether it will be agreeable now to have an executive session?

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the appropriation bill be laid aside, and I presume the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] will call up the unfinished business.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator from Florida desires to move an executive session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened,

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 24, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

TREATY WITH DENMARK.

During the executive session, on motion by Mr. STONE, the injunction of secrecy was removed from the convention between the United States and Denmark respecting the cession of the Danish West Indian Islands to the United States, which was signed at New York, August 4, 1916, and printed in confidence for the use of the Senate as Executive Document D of the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, and also from the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, quicken our minds and hearts that we may respond willingly, cheerfully, and faithfully to all the duties devolving upon us, that we may meet the close of this day with a clear conscience and be prepared for whatever awaits us to-morrow, because we have wrought faithfully. This we ask in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MILITARY PREPAREDNESS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial therein from the San Francisco Chronicle.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the San Francisco Chronicle.]

THE "PREPARATION" CRAZE.

Pending the outcome of the peace suggestions in Europe our entire program of military "preparedness" should be suspended.

What will come of the overture made by Germany we shall see in due time. The important fact is the evidence that the people of the belligerent countries are utterly disgusted with the continuous and horrible fighting and are more than ready to quit.

Nor do any of them probably particularly care what the terms are, so only that individuals of all nations are free to go and come in the world and pursue their respective callings precisely as they were before the war.

It is the vanity of the rulers and not the desires of the people which is the obstacle to peace. And the people will have their way.

And at such a time it is a shocking thing that the one great neutral Nation should completely abandon its pacific policies of past years and plunge into preparations for war.

It is said that the President feels that the situation is too delicate to make it desirable for the United States to make any suggestion.

But it would not be in the least indelicate for Congress, by joint resolution, to propose to all the belligerents that if they will disband their armies and scrap their warships we will do the same, and that, as evidence of our sincerity, our entire expansion program shall be suspended pending the result of the European war.

The heads of the Army propose a peace force of 500,000 men, with a million and a half men behind them, trained and ready for war. Some one suggests that we could probably get the 500,000 by fixing the pay of privates at $30 a month. If none in an army of 500,000 was paid in excess of $30 a month, the pay of the Army alone would be $180,000,000 a year; but the pay of officers, subsistence, and maintenance of barracks would easily bring the amount to $400,000,000 annually, and we have not added the cost of a navy "equal to that of any other power."

The world has gone mad. No war was ever waged or ever will be except for the control of trade, and no modern war can be carried on except at a cost for each side vastly exceeding any possible gain to either.

Nor can any great war be carried on except by mortgaging the energies of future generations to the extent that they can not pay and have enough left to support themselves decently.

And future generations will not endure it. Nor is there any reason why they should. We have no control of the activities of our descendants, nor are they under the slightest obligation to pay our debts. And they will not starve themselves to pay the war debts of their ancestors.

The more we spend for preparedness the more we shall be asked to spend.

The right thing to do is to stop now.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7748. An act to authorize the United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Co., and such other corporation or individuals as may be associated with it, to construct a bridge across the portion of the Delaware River between the mainland of the county of Camden and State of New Jersey, and Petty Island, in said county and State; and

S. J. Res. 182. Joint resolution authorizing an exhibition of the various activities of the Government service.

RIVERS AND HARBORS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20079, the rivers and harbors appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20079, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Smyrna River, Del.: Continuing improvement, $20,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 9, by striking out lines 15 and 16.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, on page 402 of the Engineer's report it appears that we have had a total of $107,807 thus far appropriated for this river. The balance on hand, according to the report, is $18,547. The bill calls for a new appropriation of $20,000—for a river that is 11 miles long, that has but one steamer of 96 tons upon it which makes two trips a week. In 1915, last year, we expended $747 upon this river or creek, as it may be. The commerce in 1913 reached 117,786 tons. In 1915 it had diminished to 18,580 tons, or over 85 per cent.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I want to say in fairness to this matter that the tonnage reported in 1915 and in 1914 is due to the fact that the people using that stream did not report their tonnage, and if the gentleman will bear with me further, I will also say that the reason there is so much unexpended balance is because of a controversy between the United States engineers and the people there relative to a right of way. That has since been adjusted, and the money appropriated last year and this year can well be used in continuing that project. I desire to interject my answer right there, while the gentleman is talking.

Mr. FREAR. Very well. I accept the statement. The commerce report is simply lumped in one total and it is not itemized. Ordinarily Army engineers give us statistics on which we can determine the character of commerce. This additional appropriation is for dredging upon the river. It is not for anything especial, so far as I can understand, for new jetties or anything of that kind. In view of the fact that $18,548 remain on hand and only $107,000 has been expended upon the river in all time, with one little steamer upon it, I move to strike it out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MILLER] has said, I would like to observe, with regard to the Smyrna River, Del., that the people in the larger cities, particularly Philadelphia, are now seeking communication by water with the city of Smyrna, in Delaware, and that it can be approached economically for freight purposes by way of the Smyrna River. I know of my own knowledge that a steamboat was purchased during the last year or so to establish a new communication with Smyrna from Philadelphia, and that those who undertook the purchase of this boat did so upon the assurance that the people of Smyrna were seeking aid, and that they wanted to get their goods to the market and wanted better communications with the cities with which they dealt. The difficulty was principally that there was not sufficient depth of channel in the Smyrna River to accommodate the new steamboat; and after it was purchased and efforts were made to have the channel deepened there arose a question as to the ownership of a piece of jutting land that made an elbow in the river. The desire was to straighten the river, and the whole project was held up for some considerable time, because that question of right of way or ownership had not been determined. My latest information is that they have reached an adjustment, and that the proposition to deepen and widen and straighten that river is now in a fair way of being carried out. It seems to me, again, as I stated yesterday with regard to Raccoon Creek, that this is one of the projects that ought to be commended, because it proposes to get the people in the rural districts and their products out to the larger centers in order that they may trade with the rest of the world. It is a relief proposition; it is extending the trade of a local community to the broad market beyond. Smyrna is practically bottled up, so far as water transportation is concerned, while the Smyrna River remains in its present condition. If we want to help the people in the back country, if we want to take care of those in what in foreign countries is called the hinterland, I assume the Government can engage in no other or more beneficial function than providing means by which the people may communicate with each other, by which those who are engaged in daily toil on the farm may find transportation to a profitable market for their output. I trust the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin will not be adopted.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I am glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] explained this to the committee, because the people who stand ready to invest their money in the Smyrna Steamboat Line that will use this stream are people in Philadelphia. They have been held up the past two years in starting this line because, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has said, there is a controversy regarding the right of way between the United States engineers' office and the local people who are to give the land for the cut-off. In 1913, in spite of this controversy, there were carried over this stream about 125,000 tons, valued at over $1,000,000. In 1914 it fell, according to these statistics here, to 20,000 tons, but it was valued at $300,000. Right there I want to say to the committee that, upon my own investigation, I have learned that the people who use this stream have not reported their tonnage. Now, that is their fault, but I submit that the value of this port and the value of the goods carried over this stream warrant an appropriation. In 1915 there were carried, it shows here, only 18,000 tons, as compared with 20,000 the year before, but the value is almost double—about $500,000—which further substantiates my point that these statistics are not correct, because they do not show the correct amount of tonnage really using this stream. And, as Mr. MOORE has said, for a community that is really dependent upon water transportation for its commercial livelihood the sum of $20,000 appropriated in this bill and the $18,000 left over from last year, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin refers, is not too much money to expend on this improvement. I may say that the town of Smyrna is one of those towns which was shortsighted a number of years ago when the railroad was being built through that section of the country, and they did not encourage the railroad to come there, and as a result they are on a little spur line of the Pennsylvania Railroad. I have nothing more to say, except that I trust the amendment will not be adopted, and it has merit or I would not have taken up the time of the committee to answer the remarks of my friend from Wisconsin.

I herewith append a copy of a letter received by me last year on the question of the nonreport of tonnage on the Smyrna River, as well as a copy of the statute on this point:

[Portion of letter from Mr. J. E. Hoffecker, of Smyrna, Del., relative to Smyrna River traffic.]

In regard to the tonnage on Smyrna River, which is reported by the Chief of Engineers as being 20,000 tons last year, I conferred with Mr. F. S. Malcom, manager of the Smyrna Transportation Co., and Mr. L. M. Price, principal owner of two boats operating on the Smyrna River, and both of these gentlemen are of the same opinion with me, that the tonnage reported to the Chief of Engineers does not include the tomatoes and grain transported out the Smyrna River, aggregating thousands of tons annually by tramp steamers that come to Smyrna for cargoes. For example, the steamer Vessels, owned by Capt. Vessels, of Leipsic; the steamer Princess and the steamer Denney Brothers, owned by Denney Bros., Salem, N. J.; the steamer Greensboro, owned by Capt. W. M. Vineyard, Milford, Del., all hauled tomatoes out of Smyrna River and probably not one of them filed a report with the Chief of Engineers.

Besides this trade there are numerous boats, likewise not reported, who carry out thousands of bushels of grain annually to the mills in Wilmington, Del., and various points across the bay in New Jersey. It would be almost impossible to furnish a complete record of the tonnage, because there are so many of these outside boats not reporting their traffic to anyone, whereas the engineer's office possibly only gets a report from the Smyrna Transportation Co. and Mr. L. M. Price. There are three or four other boat owners who may or may not report their business, viz: Walter Donovan, Bert Keyser, Frederick Lane, Walter W. Stokesbury, all of Smyrna post office, who are constantly trafficking on Smyrna River.

It is also proper to mention 35 or 40 fishing boats employing hundreds of men in their crews, whose traffic in the fishing business is also carried on from Smyrna River. This business is carried on by fishermen from Smyrna, Wilmington, Chester, New Castle, Delaware City, Port Penn, Pennsgrove, Woodland Beach, and so on, all of whom harbor in and use Smyrna River in connection with this business.

One of the chief points to be borne in mind is that these Delaware rivers afford the citizens of our State the only means of competition with the railroad; as you are aware, they only have one railroad system in Delaware, viz, the Pennsylvania. The steamboat lines plying on the various rivers in Delaware afford this opportunity, not only for competition with the railroad but save our people thousands of dollars annually in the cheaper water freight rates.

The Smyrna River is second in importance in the entire State of Delaware to the Christiana at Wilmington. It serves the towns of Smyrna, Clayton, Kenton, Cheswold, Hartley, and the adjacent rural country within a radius of 8 or 10 miles. If this river did not receive Government appropriations whereby it is kept free of shoals, etc., all of this traffic would be forced to go to the railroad, not only to the great inconvenience of distance but also would be compelled to suffer the penalty of higher freight rates.

* * * * * * * *

The main point, however, is to have an accurate report of the tonnage, which, as above stated, the Engineer's Office never receives. I do not know how much this unreported tonnage would amount to.

* * * * * * * *

To show you how interested our business men are in the maintenance of Smyrna River navigation I need only point to the fact that a committee having the matter in charge has secured title to rights of way for proposed cuts to eliminate crooked bends and shoals in the river, and, as I understand it, the titles deeding these rights of way have been turned over to the proper Government officials.

The law relating to the reporting of tonnage is herewith appended.

An act to facilitate the collection of commercial statistics required by section 2 of the river and harbor appropriation acts of 1866 and 1867. (Feb. 21, 1891; vol. 26, p. 766.)

Be it enacted, etc., That owners, agents, masters, and clerks of vessels arriving at or departing from localities where works of river and harbor improvement are carried on shall furnish, on application of the persons in local charge of the works, a comprehensive statement of vessels, passengers, freight, and tonnage.

SEC. 2. That every person or persons offending against the provisions of this act shall for each and every offense be liable to a fine of $100, or imprisonment not exceeding two months, to be enforced in any district court in the United States within whose territorial jurisdiction such offense may have been committed.

Approved, February 21, 1891.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Broadkill River, Del.: For maintenance, $10,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 9 by striking out line 17.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I will not add anything to what I have said with regard to the other project of Smyrna except it occurs to me that $18,000, which is $1 for every ton shipped last year, was a large enough balance to take care of it, and no justification exists for an additional $20,000 at this particular time. However, I am not discussing that further now, because it has been disposed of.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. If the gentleman will yield, I think the gentleman is mistaken; there is only $10,000 asked in line 17.

Mr. FREAR. The balance on hand is $18,548.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I was referring to the Broadkill River.

Mr. FREAR. I was referring to the Smyrna, the one just passed. I want to commend my good friend from Pennsylvania upon his ingenuity in defending every project, no matter what it may be. If it is a small project, it is for the benefit of the farmer; if it is a large project, it is for the benefit of the people of Philadelphia. I am never able to catch him unawares; he always has a ready answer for any project. Now, in the case of the Broadkill, we have expended $108,862. We have a balance on hand of $9,596, according to the engineers report, and this amendment carries $10,000 more. There were no operations on this stream in 1915. However, office expenses, which always arise in all of these cases, appear to be $228.65. In other words, there is a maintenance expense of the office on all these occasions. The contract has been completed. While this says it is to build a jetty, there is no evidence of any imperative need at this particular time for this 11-mile project which was begun in 1872. The commerce of 1915 on this project on which we have expended $108,862, reached 5,891 tons, with practically two or three small boats——

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I want to say again, in excusing these people for their negligence in not reporting tonnage, that I know personally that they have not been reporting the tonnage in this—the Broadkill River—and other Delaware streams. I tried to get them to do it, and their failure to do so is the reason such a ridiculous tonnage shows in the report.

Mr. FREAR. The tonnage is small, although I do not question the statement of the gentleman from Delaware, as I know he would not misrepresent it, even if it is his own project. There are no steamers on this river, only schooners and small power boats, according to the report of the engineers. In view of the commerce statistics furnished, I submit that in view of the money that we have expended, with no steamers on the river, with $9,596 on hand, which is nearly $2 for every ton carried last year, the project ought not in my judgment to be allowed.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak out of order for about three minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. If the gentleman wants to introduce something by unanimous consent, all right.

Mr. EMERSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the various rivers entering into the Delaware River from the State of Delaware are frequented by oystermen. These wooden vessels, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin referred, are very largely oyster pungies. It is the business of a large proportion of the people of this coast, and they need these exits and these entrances. The men go out in their pungies and dredge for oysters in the salt water of the bay, and they come back—or at least they did until recently—into these rivers, like the Broadkill, now under discussion, and there they float the oysters in fresh water and they harbor their craft. It is an industry of itself, and a great industry, resulting in the shipment to cities like Philadelphia of tens of thousands of tons of oysters that are distributed to all sections of the country, as far, indeed, as these bivalves may safely go. Why there should be an interference with the improvement of a river that is serving a public purpose in this way, I do not understand. Perhaps the farmers also use this river. I have no doubt they do. Many farmers are also oystermen and also fishermen, and they come and go with their small craft, not necessarily steamboats, but wooden boats propelled by sail or gasoline. It is an opportunity to make a living. It is the business in which American citizens are employed, and it seems to me the Government is doing the smallest thing it can do to make safe these passageways upon which such citizens come and go.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman to say that the proper use of this stream was to take the oysters up and float them in fresh water so as to bloat them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; to feed them.

Mr. MANN. Oysters do not feed on fresh water.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is in error. This time I will have to differ from my distinguished friend.

Mr. MANN. They increase in size by bloating in fresh water, and the food-control board has prohibited the shipment of such oysters.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be. Dr. Wiley had some views on that subject which were at variance with the views of the practical men engaged in the business. The gentleman from Illinois may not know it, because sometimes fresh-water oysters do not get as far west as Chicago. They have a sea tag now that passes out that way, and it may be measurably safe until the first course of the dinner is served to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, it is likely those oysters do not reach Chicago, because after they have been floated in fresh water they do not last well and are not very good. We get real salt-water oysters in Chicago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, there is a difference of opinion between practical men and theorists as to the treatment of an oyster, and if the gentleman from Illinois, who is an arboreal expert, will bear with me for a moment as an oyster expert, I will observe to him that I have been on the oyster pungies, and have spent at least a week investigating the business. And I have seen those hard-worked men get up at 3 o'clock in the morning, and I have gone out with them, and I have even assisted in the dragging of the dredge and the culling of the oysters when thrown upon deck. And I have seen them taken out on the banks in rivers like the Maurice River, on the other side of the bay, and put upon floats, not "bloats," I would say to the gentleman from Illinois, where the tide of fresh waters have flowed over them and fed them. Oysters are living things and have to be fed, and instead of carrying them away where they are in danger of dying and leaving an unpleasant taste in the mouths of epicures, they are sometimes fed, so that they may be preserved, not in alcohol but in aqua pura. Dr. Wiley and others have differed as to the propriety of feeding oysters, but the oyster has to be fed, and it has been the practice, whether the gentleman's notion of the regulations of the Department of Agriculture are correct or not.

Mr. MADDEN. As the farmer's friend, will the gentleman say these were farmers that were getting up at 3 o'clock in the morning that he was assisting in taking in the dredge?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The farmer gets up with the rise of the sun and goes to bed with the setting thereof, and the oysterman does likewise, and as I have been the farmer's friend on this floor, so now in this emergency I beg to be considered the friend of the oysterman. [Laughter.]

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to proceed out of order for a few moments.

On yesterday my good friend from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] caused to have read into the RECORD a telegram from some Colorado woman's suffrage party stating the reasons for the picketing of the White House were because of the undemocratic blocking of the Federal suffrage amendment by the President and his party. Now, there is where these militants fail in their argument. The President and his party promised the male voters of this country many things that they did not keep. The President and his party promised the male voters to reduce the high cost of living, and did not keep the promise; but the male voters do not picket the White House for that reason. But the male voters of this country would have defeated the President and his party because of their failure to keep that promise had it not been for the female voters in these suffrage States. If the female voters would use the ballot a little more wisely, they could accomplish more than by this picketing process. Why, the women run this country, but some of them evidently have not found it out yet.

The best homes in this country are run by women, but not by militants. Last fall thousands of husbands, fathers, and sons voted for the President and his party because they were asked to by wives, mothers, sisters, and sweethearts, for the reason that the President had kept the country out of war.

I desire to say to my militant friends that one vote in the ballot box on election day is worth 100 pickets outside the White House fence.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. KING. Since the President has made his escape from the White House and is now going to be at the Capitol three days in the week, has the gentleman any notion as to whether the Capitol will be picketed or not?

Mr. EMERSON. I have no such information. It might be a good idea, however.

But they say the President and his party promised to assist them to get a Federal amendment which would provide for woman's suffrage. If this is true, he failed to keep his promise for three and one-half years, yet the women of this country elected him again. Instead of voting for a man for President who promised openly for suffrage these militants in the States where they had the suffrage voted for the man who they claim failed to keep his promise. It is one argument against woman's suffrage, if they are so blind as to permit the President and his party to fool them for three and a half years and then reelect him. Male voters do not do things that way. Mr. Hughes stood openly for suffrage by Federal amendment, and yet I imagine I can see last fall a company of old-maid militants marching under a Wilson and Marshall banner with this inscription: "Vote for Wilson; he saved the lives of our sons by keeping the country out of war." Nevertheless, I am for suffrage by States and by Federal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway between Rehoboth Bay and Delaware Bay, Del.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $50,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 9, by striking out lines 18, 19, and 20.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is the same amendment that I opposed to the last item; and I repeat my motion in respect to this item, because it seems to me it is a tremendous expense to undertake on this project as compared with the returns that will come to us from it.

We have already appropriated $122,000 for this 6-foot canal. We have a balance on hand, according to the report of the engineers, of $65,181, and yet this bill carries an additional amount of $50,000. Out of the last payment, as near as I can ascertain or find out, there was $69,710 paid by the Government for railroad damages. It is proposed now to continue the work, with a commerce that reaches 13,655 tons. There are no steamers on the stream.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I understand, of course, the remark of the gentleman that the project is not completed, and that we therefore can not ascertain what the commerce will be.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I appreciate the gentleman answering his own question. Last year he brought this point up here, and the project had not then been completed. Last week the project was completed, and the first cargo to go through the canal was carried.

I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that 13,000 tons carried in 1915 was while the canal was in process of construction. But it was not complete.

Mr. FREAR. Was this Government material?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. No; it was not Government material. It was freight going down to Lewes, which is at one end of the canal.

Mr. FREAR. There were no steamers on this stream, according to the report, but 11 power boats. This information was furnished by interested parties. It is a 6-foot canal, to cost $156,000. About one-half is completed, and $65,000 is on hand, and at this time, in the present condition of the Government finances, it seems to me it is unnecessary to appropriate the additional $50,000.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take the time of the committee, but I sympathize with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] in a good many points he has raised. I was able to agree with him on the public-buildings bill. Although I had a project in it, I voted against it. But as to some of the points he has raised to-day about these projects——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Delaware yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. No; I can not yield to the gentleman at this time. I would not like to be discourteous. If I have time, I will come back. I feel, as long as the gentleman from Wisconsin is directing his remarks to certain of these matters, that it is my duty to present the other side, especially as I have taken the trouble to go over these streams, every one of them, not only once, but several times.

The last project for which he has moved to strike out the appropriation is one that was adopted about 20 years ago. The total appropriation called for is $250,000. As he says, $182,000 has already been appropriated and this bill carries an appropriation of $50,000, making a total of $232,000.

If his amendment is carried the project will not be completed. The money that has been spent will be absolutely wasted. If I wanted to take the time of the House I could demonstrate to the Members very clearly the condition from the standpoint of one who has been over this ground thoroughly, that it would be not only a waste of the $182,000 already appropriated, but it would be an absolute dropping of a project that has every reason to be included in this bill from the standpoint of merit. The country through which this canal goes is a very sandy country. Many points are too far away from a railroad for economical hauling. The canal connects an inland bay with Delaware Bay, and as I called attention to the fact a few moments ago, the project was not completed last year, but nevertheless over it was carried a total value of agricultural products amounting to $203,000. I submit that when that tonnage, to the value just indicated, is carried over it in a year in which it is not completed, it augurs well for the proper use of that project when it is completed. It was only last week, as I said, that the first cargo went through from one end of the canal to the other. The total amount of expenditure will be only $232,000, and the maintenance will not be expensive.

In answer to the gentleman's remark that no steamers are used on this canal, it is not necessary for large steamers to be used to haul these products out. They are carried from an inland agricultural country to Lewes, which is at one entrance of Delaware Bay, and the produce is there placed on steamers for Philadelphia or on railroads for transportation to other points, or if it is intended for transportation abroad, outside of the country, there are ocean steamers that touch at that point.

I will not take up more time of the House at this point, but I wanted to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Wisconsin, although he means well by his remarks, is not altogether accurate in them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway from Delaware River to Chesapeake Bay, Del. and Md.: For improvement by the purchase of the existing Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and appurtenant property, in accordance with the project recommended by the Chief of Engineers in paragraph 3 of his report dated August 9, 1913, as published in House Document No. 196, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $1,300,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to purchase said canal and appurtenant property at a cost not to exceed the amount herein appropriated for such purpose.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the paragraph. The Clerk will report the gentleman's motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on pages 9 and 10 by striking out the paragraph, beginning with line 24 on page 9 and ending with line 9 on page 10.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is what is known as the Chesapeake & Delaware 13-mile canal, which is a part of one of the links of the inland waterway project that is to run along the Atlantic coast. It was in the bill four years ago, and an effort was made to strike it out at that time, but it remained in the bill until the bill was defeated in the Senate.

The engineers have submitted three different propositions in the past on this project. One is for a 12-foot canal. That will reach $8,000,000 in expense. That is the one which ostensibly is placed in the bill. Another is for a canal of 25 feet depth, to cost $12,000,000, and that is what is proposed to be carried on after the first project has been started. The third project, which is the only one that can be of service to the preparedness program just now being urged in favor of the canal, is one of 35 feet depth, which will cost all the way between $22,000,000 and $23,000,000. I have not the figures before me. The bill before us carries $1,300,000 for this canal. It is known generally in the House and in the Senate—that is sure to take place—that the initial appropriation must be doubled if we are to have this canal, because the Army engineers say it will not be bought for less than $2,500,000, in round numbers. It was increased by the Senate committee to approximately that amount four years ago.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is there any way of proving up these figures of $2,500,000?

Mr. FREAR. I do not see how; but I say $1,300,000 can not touch it. And now, to carry out the thought of the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will put the statistics in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman say $1,300,000 can not touch it? Is the canal worth more than that as an operating proposition?

Mr. FREAR. I will explain to the gentleman by reading what I was about to take up. On January 2, 1915, the president of this canal company wrote the Army engineers a letter, from which I will read a brief extract:

The board of directors of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. do not control the stockholders or bondholders of that company, and the question as to what price will be accepted by them for their interest must be one which they alone can answer. The board do not see how they could do anything more than state that they could recommend a price that would be the par value of the bonds and give a sufficient amount for the stockholders to induce them to consent to the sale.

Now, four years ago, before this project to purchase the canal was proposed seriously by the Government, some one stated upon the floor of the House—I think it was the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]—that the stock was worthless and the bonds worth only 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will have to correct the gentleman on that. I made no such statement as to the bonds.

Mr. FREAR. To my best recollection, the statement was made here by some one.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I may have said that my information was—I have no direct personal information upon this subject at all—that the stock was worthless, but that the bonds were paying 4 per cent, it being a going company and the bonds being distributed amongst a large number of estates which had acquired them by reason of the death of the original holders.

Mr. FREAR. At that time it was stated, and apparently with authority, that the bonds were worth only 50 cents on the dollar, which, of course, is hardly possible if this was a going corporation and paying 4 per cent.

Mr. COX. For how much is that concern capitalized?

Mr. FREAR. I do not remember. The Government, I think, paid over $500,000 as a bonus when it was originally started. Then Pennsylvania and Maryland made some contributions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman let me read, in his time, some figures with respect to this?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. COX. How much is it bonded for?

Mr. FREAR. More than $1,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The original stock subscription was $1,162,038.50. The original cost of construction was $2,201,864.03, so that the company was obliged to assume a floating debt of $1,039,825.53, which was increased by annual deficits for more than 20 years after the canal was opened. As to the question of values, I think the gentleman will not deny that there is value there. He will not deny, I think, that the Government board appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the value appraised the property at $2,514,000. The canal now carries a million tons of commerce a year, and to take it away without consideration is suggestive of confiscation.

Mr. COX. I do not think there is any desire to take it away without compensation. I wish the gentleman would state to the committee the amount of outstanding bonds against it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will put that all in the RECORD.

Mr. COX. Can not the gentleman state it? I have not time to read it all.

Mr. MANN. What is the operating profit of this canal now?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not competent to tell the gentleman, because I have studiously kept out of the financial question; but my information is that the company has earned enough money to pay 4 per cent interest on its bonds. That the property is running down, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] says, may be true in that it costs money to keep the property going; but apparently, from what you can see with the naked eye, the company owns a large estate, has locks and buildings and grounds and a right of way and tugboats. The company is not chartered to do a transportation business. It is simply a toll company, which stands there with inadequate facilities when it might be made serviceable for the carriage of 50,000,000 tons of commerce which originate in the immediate vicinity.

Mr. COX. Is it carrying the commerce satisfactorily?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Such as it can; but as it stands it is a positive menace to the safety of the country in time of war.

Mr. COX. Is it carrying the commerce now?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is carrying a million tons a year. The amount has fluctuated. This old canal was a dream of the forefathers of the country. It was commenced in 1825 and finished in 1829. It was the only great carrier between the North and the South. We talk to-day of the South being in the saddle. Historically in those days the South was in the saddle, financially and in almost every other way. The centers of wealth and population were largely in Virginia and other Southern States, and canals were their means of transportation, along with the earthen roads. The railroad did not come until years after this canal was constructed and doing business. It was a great patriotic move of the big men of the country to build this canal to facilitate the commerce of the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. I just want to add one more proposition, Mr. Chairman. I have been through this canal. I have seen it and I know what it is. There is a little commerce, inconsiderable as compared with the commerce that we see on waterways ordinarily; but four years ago it was proposed to purchase it as a commerce-bearing canal, at a depth of 12 feet; but now the proposition is to put it in our great scheme of preparedness. The difficulty of that lies in this: That the engineers recommend on the same page and in the same pamphlet that we proceed to dig a canal across New Jersey, which is equally imperative, at a cost of $45,000,000 for a 25-foot canal, and there is no limitation if we are going to have a 35-foot canal, which is to be another connecting link, and according to Admiral Benson is equally important and necessary for the protection of New York and Philadelphia. Then, of course, there will be the additional canals at the southern end of the system proposed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no project before the House for a canal from Philadelphia to New York. The gentleman knows there is a canal now existing between the Delaware River and New York. That was another scheme of the forefathers before the days of the railroad.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; it was all right for our forefathers when canals were popular and commerce was carried upon them in the early days to provide canals. To-day it seems foolish to urge upon us that this canal can carry troops advantageously when the railroads can carry fifty times as many in the course of a day, and yet that is one argument advanced.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Speaking of carrying troops, this canal in its limited condition did actually carry troops from the North to the city of Annapolis to protect the city of Washington, at the call of Abraham Lincoln, at a time when the railroads were disabled, and it helped to save the fate of the Nation.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I have heard that frequently; but that was before great trunk lines were running from Philadelphia to Baltimore.

New York has or is spending $100,000,000 for a great canal. If the people of Pennsylvania who insist that they are going to be benefited, and the people of Maryland who expect to be benefited, feel that this canal is so valuable to them, why do they not offer to contribute toward the canal when New York is putting up $100,000,000 for her canal. We have been dredging the Delaware River at a cost of $23,000,000 so far, up to the city of Philadelphia, and doing all we can to help my friend from Pennsylvania and to satisfy him. Now, they insist upon a 35-foot canal at Government expense. This project is for 12 feet but the other follows. I appeal to the House if it is fair to require the Government to do what is practically for the interests of Pennsylvania and Maryland primarily? Of course, there is some little commerce below, but a large part of it is timber that is being cut off in the Carolinas.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Is there any provision or any recommendation by the Army engineers requiring cooperation on the part of Maryland or Pennsylvania?

Mr. FREAR. No; we find that in the case of some streams, but it is not here with reference to this project.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think it is not cooperation for the city of Philadelphia to spend $13,000,000 to improve docks and piers, in order to take care of such new business as may come through this canal and from other sources?

Mr. FREAR. It is not at all in the nature of a contribution. In Germany those people insist on a contribution of a certain per cent, and a certain per cent goes to the locality.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a Government enterprise.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; a government enterprise, but they have to pay the dredging and improvement of the waterways. Here all they do is to give the land and put up a pier, and that is called a contribution, whereas it is none whatever; it is simply a local project in the matter of building wharves.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested naturally in the discussion of this question by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his answers to the suggestion by the gentleman from Wisconsin that there ought to be some larger contribution. I can not forget his very eloquent speeches made at the last session of Congress when another bill was being considered in which he explained with great frequency, and always with earnestness and eloquence, how it was that there should be a very much larger contribution on the part of those who were particularly benefited by that river and harbor improvement. I am interested in hearing, as I said, this discussion to-day. I see that he has taken points from the debate that proceeded last year, and I congratulate him that he is doing so well. I have no doubt that he will be materially assisted in this by his colleague on this side of the Chamber, who made some remarks along the same line last year. However, I shall vote for this proposition.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is referring to the discussion on the bill relating to the flood control in the Mississippi River?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There is an item carried in this bill of about the same amount that would be carried for the first year in the flood-control bill. Does the gentleman recall whether the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, that was then having a cat fit because there was no provision for contribution, has included any provision for a contribution in this bill?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not think they have.

Mr. MANN. Their memory seems to be pretty short.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, some question has been asked about this proposition presented here four years ago. The bill then provided for an appropriation of $1,300,000 to purchase this canal. That was arrived at in this way: The stock has paid no dividends since 1874. It was charged, with considerable vehemence, that we were called upon to spend $1,300,000 of the people's money for a canal which had not paid any dividend on the stock since 1874, which was a pretty raw proposition. But that is not all the truth; that is part of the truth. In addition to the stock we would get $2,600,000 in bonds of this canal, which had paid interest at the rate of 4 per cent and never defaulted through the long series of years. In addition to that they had saved enough from the tolls to keep the canal in good condition, and at that particular time, as I recall, there was a surplus of $70,000 in the treasury to take care of any emergency that might arise.

So we were getting not a worthless canal, as indicated by the statement that it had paid no dividends on the stock since 1874, but we were getting a canal which had paid 4 per cent on $2,600,000 in bonds, had never defaulted, and in addition had made enough money to keep the canal in good order and put by a surplus of $70,000, which it had on hand.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall what the net operating revenue of this company is?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; I do not. I have not thought about it for four years.

Mr. MANN. I just looked up the report and find it is something over $100,000 a year. The interest upon the bonds is $104,000, but, of course, that comes out of the net operating revenue, and there has been some surplus in recent years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not know what the gentleman means by "net operating revenue."

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought to know what I mean by net operating revenue.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Possibly I ought, but still I do not know what it means.

Mr. MANN. The language itself is sufficient, and the gentleman has business experience enough to know what the net operating revenue means.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The business that I have been engaged in has never had any net operating revenue. [Laughter.] But this particular proposition has never defaulted upon the interest on its bonds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, let me finish this statement. Two million six hundred thousand dollars in bonds paying 4 per cent interest we were to get. We were to pay just half of that amount, $1,300,000, just half the face value of the bonds, so that upon the $1,300,000 that we proposed to pay we would receive interest of 8 per cent, judging the future by the past. We were to get these bonds. We inquired among the business men of Philadelphia on the stock exchange there, the bankers who knew the value of these properties, and we were advised by them that these bonds were listed at 50 cents, that that was a fair market value, that that was what it was reasonably supposed they could be purchased for on the market, so that we took the $2,600,000 and just divided it by 2, and that is the way the committee arrived at $1,300,000, which it was proposed to appropriate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have in hand the report of the Committee on Coast and Insular Survey, Senator SAULSBURY, chairman, which goes over this whole matter after an investigation and hearing. They had all the witnesses they could find before them with a view of ascertaining the value of this property, and as to the question raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], they say this:

> The revenues from tows and towages for the year ending May 31, 1913, was $186,940.68. The revenues from all other sources during that fiscal year were $4,220.07, making a total revenue of $191,190.75.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will excuse me for a moment, I have taken this time in order to answer that particular question so that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and others upon this side who are particularly interested in this canal might not be bothered further about replying to these particular charges, but might devote their time to explaining why it was that there is no greater amount of local contribution provided by Philadelphia. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman let me explain it now?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No. [Laughter.] The gentleman, I dare say, will have ample opportunity in which to make that explanation, and I suggest that if he will get the speeches I made last year in answer to his criticism that there was not sufficient local contribution upon the Mississippi River, and read them to the House, it might be worth while, and perhaps accomplish the desired result. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] that the fight I made on the flood-control bill, which he brought in and for which he is entitled to most of the credit, was made in the interest of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. I was endeavoring to preserve the authority of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. I am rather glad we had the experience, because it would be useful to-day in the event of certain questions arising upon this floor.

As to local cooperation, and with respect to a project passing through a series of States, as this Chesapeake & Delaware Canal does, I assume the question would be exactly similar to that of the Mississippi, particularly in the upper stretches of that river, because there are contributions from the lower States—where the answer always is that it is a national project, that it courses through a series of States, and that you can not enforce contributions from one State where a number of States are directly interested and involved.

The Chesapeake & Delaware presents the problem of connecting up for useful purposes this great body of water, the Chesapeake Bay, through 13 miles of mainland, now dug for canal purposes, with that other great body of water, the Delaware Bay and the Delaware River. The intracoastal scheme contemplates the union of these waters from, so far as this map before us is concerned, Beaufort, N. C. [indicating], which is underneath Cape Hatteras, up through Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds, to an existing canal which has been taken over by the Government, into Hampton Roads behind Norfolk, through the Chesapeake Bay on up to this point at the head of Chesapeake Bay, where now the progress of the Nation, both from a strategic and commercial point of view, is blocked, at least to the limit of a 10-foot waterway capacity. The proposition is to open that waterway to greater service in order that the commerce that comes up here, or the war vessels that find it necessary to go inside and avoid the dangers of Cape Hatteras and other points along the coast, may be safeguarded and permitted to move on a standardized waterway with as much safety and certainty as they might do upon railroads. All this is possible, but at present can not be done while these several small connecting links like the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal stand in the way. Here is the Delaware River running the other side of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal to the city of Trenton. From near by an old canal passes on to Raritan Bay, connecting up the East River into Long Island Sound. Gentlemen will observe that the whole course is sheltered. We often discuss these natural conditions, even from the God-given viewpoint.

Why was this great waterway thrown up in sections here, and here, and here [indicating on the map], and this splendid one connecting New England through Long Island Sound, except it was intended by the Creator himself that man should improve what he had thus provided?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If I understood the gentleman, God intended to have an inland canal all the way along, but He got tired and did not finish the job?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I assume the gentleman has a closer association with the Almighty than I have.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think that is likely. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Coming from Chicago, I assume he needed it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The closer we get the better.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is very hard to come back, especially after you have lived in Chicago. We once read a book about what Christ would do in Chicago. This, however, is a practical proposition, although for the moment we are giving it a rather reverential aspect. [Laughter.] With all deference to my distinguished friend from Illinois, these waterways are here, and it is possible to link them up by doing a little digging here and there.

Mr. Chairman, this story has been so often told in the House that I hesitate to take much time on it now, but it is not understood in some sections of the country. What we are endeavoring to do is to make a connection like that, and that [illustrating on map], in order to bring into thorough and complete communication 1,800 miles of shore line within the ocean. Now, one of my best friends, one of the distinguished Members of this House, more distinguished than any other possibly, has sometimes indicated that we ought to go out on the ocean to do our trading. Why, gentlemen, during the last two months the papers have recorded probably a dozen disasters to shipping at sea along our coast. Some one has said it makes no difference as to the cost if a single life is to be saved. Men make this sort of preachment when they deliver lectures, and get intensely sympathetic about "your boy," and "my boy," who is sailing out upon the high seas. I can grow even more practical in my sympathy. It has not been so long since 17 men living in my district, or nearly, here in Philadelphia, sailed down this river on barges that could have gone through an improved waterway safely; were towed out to sea, carried around the treacherous shoals of Barnegat, upon which there have been three disasters during the last two months, one a Government vessel—the transport Sumner—a complete loss to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These men passed out on barges, under tow, carrying coal to the people of New England, and were wrecked at this point [indicating Cape Cod], where every one of the 17 was lost. I say, with such regrettable instances in mind, I have a right to be practically sympathetic in addressing Congress, and to say, "Why not give the money to cut through here [indicating] and to cut through here [indicating], in order that we may have safe communication for this ordinary, everyday routine business that must be carried on between the North and the South?" Why risk it any further?

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. Could that boat on which the 17 people were lost have been cared for by this proposed canal?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It could.

Mr. FREAR. What was the draft of that boat?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Less than 12 feet, as I recall.

Mr. FREAR. The Army engineers' report says that this canal when built will only accommodate a boat of 10 feet, and I was wondering if the gentleman was right in regard to this transport.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is partially right. The existing canal has a depth of 10 feet, but the new canal would begin with a depth of 12 feet, and there would be required at least 1 foot of leeway; but we are looking to a greater depth, as the engineers have suggested.

The Secretary of the Navy has indicated on several occasions that there are a few vessels of the Navy that can go through this old Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, but only a few. The Navy Department would like to have the canal deepened, because they are constantly sending small vessels, submarines, torpedo-boat destroyers, torpedo boats, small munition ships, and so forth, from the navy yard here [Boston] to the navy yard here [New York] and the navy yard here [Philadelphia] and the navy yard at Norfolk, and they would a thousand times rather in these times of peace have the security of these inside passages than to go to sea and take the risk of a December or January storm and be wrecked at sea. And why should we take that risk in times of peace? One Secretary of the Navy once proposed to send four torpedo boats from the New York Navy Yard to the Charlestown Navy Yard, and I asked him to send them through the inside passage, to test out whether it would be the wisest, the speediest, and safest thing to do. I think it was Secretary Newberry. He wrote me that the department desired to use that passageway but the draft of the vessels was too great, and they must go outside.

Now, gentlemen will pardon me for telling this story again on the floor of the House, but some may not have heard it. When those four vessels reached Cape Hatteras they struck a storm and they were driven out to sea. Some of the men were injured; fortunately, no lives were lost; but the revenue cutters had to go to sea on an alarm call to bring these vessels home, and one of them that was not reached by the revenue cutters had to be beached in order that the lives on board might be saved and the property of the Government salvaged.

That was a bitter proof. We have dozens of them every year in commerce. We have many of them every year in the ordinary affairs of the Army and Navy. Do my distinguished friends, who have given little thought to this question, know that in the War Department alone we have more than 2,500 vessels? They are not all vessels of large draft. Some of them are engineers' boats. Why, the War Department's fleet, I think, in numbers equals that of the Navy fleet. If it does not, it is very close to it. And these vessels are doing what? They are engaged upon the inland waterways most of the time. Some of them are not equipped to go out to sea. As between this point and that point [indicating], a distance of only 13 miles, we could give them a safe inside passage from the Norfolk Navy Yard to the Philadelphia Navy Yard, from stream to stream, saving them an outside sailing distance of 325 miles; and this when the sailing is frequent and on routine business. Gentlemen, why do we drive them out to sea down here along the coasts of Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, and then up the Chesapeake Bay, a distance of 325 miles, when all that risk and delay could be saved by this simple improvement of 13 miles? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise merely for the purpose of indorsing the action of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in including in this bill the item for the purchase of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, for I think it one of the most important items in the bill and one that remains in it without change or amendment.

I am not so much concerned about the deep-water coastwise shipping as I am about the barge and light-draft traffic that would use a waterway like that. The section traversed by that canal is one of great commercial activity, greater than any other on the Atlantic except that of New York Harbor and connecting waters.

Now, as to the cost, I fully indorse what was said by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. We had occasion to go very carefully into that feature when we were preparing the 1914 bill, and in view of his criticism of the engineers and his reference to the attention paid their recommendations by the committee, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to the fact that, notwithstanding the engineers recommended we pay something like $2,600,000 for this canal, or not less, as I recall, than $1,800,000, we fixed the price, after careful consideration, at $1,300,000, which I think is a fair price. That was fixed upon the basis, as stated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], of about 50 per cent on the value of the bonds of the company. Reading from the report, which is somewhat hazy as to value, we found that the bonds had about absorbed the stock and that when the bonds are paid the stock will be practically worthless. Now, somebody had stated, as the report showed, that the bonds were worth about 50 cents on the dollar; and there being about 2,600 of them, we thought $1,300,000 was a sufficient amount to pay for them. We might have eliminated a part of the $2,600,000 had we been desirous of so doing, as about $600,000 of those bonds, as I recall now, were said to be a fraudulent or an overissue of bonds, but were later on indorsed by the management of the company; and so it appeared to us the property was liable for the entire amount. Hence we fixed the value at half that, or $1,300,000.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Of course this is purely a canal, an artificial waterway. I take it the committee before recommending the purchase or the construction of an artificial inland waterway has taken very careful consideration of the general subject as to how far these artificial waterways are profitable, and in consideration of that question must have given attention to the principal artificial waterway now in existence in America, the Hennepin Canal, which runs through the richest territory in the United States. Is the gentleman able to tell how much money now passes through the Hennepin Canal—what the cost of operation is, and how much it costs the Government for each ton of freight that passes through that canal?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would say in answer to the last question of the gentleman that, as I understand it, the cost and operation of the Hennepin Canal is perhaps out of proportion to the freight carried over the canal. I do not recall the tonnage exactly, but I think it is perhaps a little less than 30.000 tons per annum.

Mr. MANN. The cost of the canal was, to begin with, $20,000,000——

Mr. SPARKMAN And was not recommended by the River and Harbor Committee.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Connecting two of the principal commercial waterways of America, and running through a very rich country. Now, how far does the committee take into consideration where it has made an experiment before it makes another experiment?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, we have considered not so much the general question of canals as we have the specific conditions surrounding a proposition whenever presented to construct or purchase a canal.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was on the committee when the Hennepin Canal proposition was presented?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was not in Congress then.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was on the committee when the Hennepin Canal——

Mr. SPARKMAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was not. And the River and Harbor Committee had nothing to do with the construction of the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. MANN. It was since I came to Congress, and the gentleman came to Congress before I did.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman is wrong again. The construction of that canal was begun in 1890. I did not come to Congress until 1894. And, besides, its construction was not recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but by the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. It is a river and harbor project and the river and harbor bill carried the appropriation.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Again I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am not mistaken. I know exactly what I am talking about. The proposition first came, as I recall, to the House from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. A point of order was made against it by some one, and the presiding officer held that the River and Harbor Committee did not have jurisdiction of it, and it went to the Committee on Railroads and Canals.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is perfectly patent. Gen. Henderson, of Illinois, a Member of this House for a long time—and I believe he was chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but, if not, he was very high in rank—got this proposition allowed for in the river and harbor bill, though it was carried through when Mr. Reeves was a member of the committee. The gentleman was a member of the committee, and I was in the House. I visited the canal when the work was first commenced. But that has nothing to do with the question. It was an experiment. I take it the committee has examined to see whether it was a successful experiment or not. It is a canal running from the Mississippi River to the Illinois River, connecting with the city of Chicago by water, connecting with the city of St. Louis by water, connecting with the upper Mississippi by water, connecting with Iowa by water, connecting along the line of transportation between the East and the West, maintained at very heavy expense, and I suppose it costs about $10 or $15 to the Government for each ton of freight that goes a mile on it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, I will say in further answer to the gentleman that while I have considered somewhat the results in a financial way of the construction of the Hennepin Canal I have not done so with reference to the purchase and remodeling of this canal, for the reason that I think that each proposition should stand on its own merits. Besides I think this one is a better proposition. This canal is accommodating ten, twenty, perhaps thirty, times as much commerce as that carried by the Hennepin Canal or transported on the railroads paralleling it.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman is mistaken. There is ten times as much commerce passing along the line of the Hennepin Canal as will pass over that canal.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I differ with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not studied the railroad situation. He is not familiar with it. If he had studied it he would know that the Burlington Railroad, the Rock Island, the Milwaukee & St. Paul, and in fact all the railroads of the West are in competition with the Hennepin Canal. That is the reason why the Hennepin Canal does not do any business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask if the contrast of the Hennepin Canal with the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is fair in reference to the terminals?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As to the railroads that are there, is it not a fact that Chicago probably has 25 or 30 or more, perhaps, trunk-line railroads coming and going to offset any canal, whereas as a matter of fact we have but two roads paralleling the territory traversed by the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think that is so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And has it not been shown before the committee, and is it not in evidence in the report known as the Agnus report, that the commerce on the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal is estimated at 50,000,000 tons annually?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is one of the reasons why we advocate the construction of this canal, to afford a relief for freight and transportation, because instead of having 25 or 30 trunk lines coming and going, as they have at Chicago, to reach out and radiate to every section of the country, we have only two lines, that are so greatly overdone that the great railroads of the East are compelled to issue embargoes on freight, not having sufficient cars to carry it.

Mr. MANN. That is a matter of local condition all over the United States. The reasons given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania are not sound. The question is, When these artificial canals are constructed can they carry, or will they carry, the freight cheaper than by rail? Our experience is, after having built a canal and given the people the right to carry over it for nothing, the expense being paid by the Government, it still can not compete with the railroads. The business is there. There is more business there than there will ever be in this canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I ought to apologize for taking any more time on this item. But it appears to me that some facts exist regarding it which have not been stated. This project can rest upon the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—that is to say, whether, if this canal is constructed, it will carry a large commerce and at a cheaper price than is exacted by the railroads? The answer to that question upon all the evidence must be in the affirmative, and I ask the attention of gentlemen who may have any doubt in their minds regarding that proposition.

This canal connects the great Chesapeake Bay, upon which are situated Baltimore, Norfolk, Newport News, and other large cities, with the Delaware River, upon which are situated Philadelphia and Wilmington. The Delaware River is the busiest interior waterway in the United States, so that the mere fact that this waterway will connect the Chesapeake Bay and the Delaware River, both having large existing commerce, is a fact which will arrest the attention of gentlemen who wish to know the importance of this project.

Again, this waterway connecting Chesapeake Bay with the Delaware River has been investigated by both civilian and engineer commissions at least six or seven times. It has been investigated by commercial organizations. I challenge any critic or opponent of this bill to find anywhere in the official reports or the reports of any commercial organization, no matter where located, any report which did not unreservedly commend this project for its commercial value. If the gentleman knows of any report to the contrary, I ask him to state it.

In addition, I advert to the last report of the engineers upon this project. I am reading from House Document No. 391, Sixty-second Congress, second session, page 97. This relates to the commerce upon this waterway. Now, I read from page 98:

> According to the reports of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co., the average annual shipments through the canal for the last five years have been 716,644 tons, for which the tolls have averaged $163,151.33, or a general average of 22¾ cents per ton.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SMALL. May I have five minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Now, as to the commercial value, if converted into a free canal. First, let me say that this canal at the present time affords very restricted facilities for commerce. It is a lock canal. The locks have a width of only 24 feet, so that barges and steamers which operate through this waterway have to be constructed to fit the locks rather than be built along plans best adapted to carrying capacity. Now, as to the commerce which would be developed upon this as a free waterway and as a tidal canal—and that is what it is proposed to be—I read from the report this extract:

> Letters requesting information as to their own individual shipments were sent to commercial organizations, boards of trade, and all shippers whose names could be secured, and in many cases large shippers were personally interviewed, sometimes several calls being made before the desired information was obtained, and in other cases repeated visits secured no information. No information could be obtained from underwriters of marine insurance.
> The data obtained can be only a fraction of the total commerce, but the statement below is compiled from the figures received from shippers as to their own shipments, and may be considered authentic as far as it goes. Some of the heaviest shippers were among those who failed to furnish figures. According to the responses received, the following existing commerce could and would use a free canal to advantage:

Shipments from southern points: Iron, 120,000 tons; lumber, 496,889 tons; tomatoes, 1,361 tons; coal, 140,000 tons; chemicals, 17,000 tons; paints, etc., 600 tons; miscellaneous, 231,564 tons; or a total of 1,012,814 tons.

In addition to the above there was reported freight amounting in value to $375,000, but the tonnage was not stated.

Shipments from northern points: Bridge iron, 18,000 tons; coal, 872,518 tons; tomatoes, 16,748 tons; oils, 600 tons; granite, etc., 40,111 tons; fruits, 300 tons; miscellaneous, 481,921 tons; or a total of 1,430,208 tons.

In addition to the above, freight worth $195,000 was reported, but the tonnage was not stated.

The total shipments reported amount to 2,537,622 tons, valued at $14,170,239.

I have read from the report of the engineers, who say that they made a careful investigation, that they could not obtain reports from all the parties who could use this waterway, and that this represents the minimum rather than a maximum of the commerce that would use this canal if converted into a free tidal canal.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Can the gentleman suggest a plausible theory upon which the Chief of the Army Engineers has predicated the recommendation that the acquisition of the canal from the Delaware River to Raritan Bay in New Jersey should be based upon the condition that the State of New Jersey should give the right of way, whereas the canal connecting the Delaware River and the Chesapeake Bay puts upon the Government the burden of purchasing the right of way from the stockholders?

Mr. SMALL. I can not yield further. I am not going to be diverted to any waterway across the State of New Jersey. I am talking about this waterway connecting the Chesapeake Bay and Delaware Bay.

Mr. HULBERT. My question related to this waterway, if the gentleman followed the question that I propounded.

Mr. SMALL. The question could be answered satisfactorily, but I do not wish to take up the time unduly. This project is for a depth of 12 feet, a bottom width of 90 feet, and a greater width over all, and is intended to be a tidal canal, doing away with the present locks. I have adverted to the commerce, showing the importance of this waterway, and I think I have given an answer to the queries suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to whether, if this waterway were constructed according to the plans of the engineers, it would carry a large commerce and more cheaply than the railroads. Upon that question of cheapness, the value of a free canal may be stated as follows: Annual saving in freight, $551,933, as stated on page 99 of the report.

Now, Mr. Chairman, something has been said about a greater depth for this canal. When this report was submitted, the Chief of Engineers reserved the right to submit a supplemental report, which he did submit in House document 196, Sixty-third Congress, first session, dated August 12, 1913; and without taking up the time to read the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, he said substantially that he recommended the purchase of this canal, its immediate deepening to 12 feet with adequate width, and that its subsequent deepening to 25 feet or more should depend upon the commerce it developed, its strategic value to the United States Government, and the question of cooperation from the States immediately contiguous to this waterway. So that the question of greater depth depends upon these considerations.

There was a later report submitted upon this waterway in Senate document 14, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and that report, in answer to a resolution of the Senate asking its strategic value as an arm of defense, and the price at which it could probably be purchased, contains a statement from the General Army Board, in which they unreservedly commend this waterway as a valuable arm of defense. It is true they say that it ought to be deeper than 12 feet for this purpose, but that is not the question now before the committee.

A depth of 12 feet will accommodate the commerce between Chesapeake Bay and Delaware River and will accommodate the through commerce originating from ports south of Hatteras with ports north of Hatteras, and the question of a greater depth to accommodate ocean shipping or to accommodate warships can well be left to the future after it shall have been improved to 12 feet, making a tidal canal a completed factor. I think it is fair to say that everyone who has ever investigated this waterway in the light of all the evidence submitted and of the reports, both from the engineers and commercial organizations, must reach the conclusion that as a commercial proposition, as a creator of water-borne traffic, as a saving of freight, it is worth acquiring and worth improving, and is one of the important, if not one of the most important, projects carried in this bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. I believe the question before the Committee of the Whole is the striking out of this item of $1,300,000 for the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. I am in favor of its retention in the bill, although not very much in favor of the project itself. I am in favor of it because it looks to me as though, if we hold that item in the bill, the canal will not be purchased, and I think that is an end very desirable to attain. We can not secure any price from the present owners of the canal. The officers of the organization do not seem to know who does own it; but, at any rate, every effort that has been made for the last 10 years on the part of committees or commissions to secure any price has failed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not condemnation remedy all that?

Mr. TREADWAY. I would be very glad to touch on the subject of condemnation. The advocates of the taking over of this canal before the River and Harbor Committee desired that there should go into the bill a condemnation clause rather than the kind of an item that we did put in. I am betraying no confidence of the committee when I say that the committee were absolutely opposed to the condemnation item upon the very ground that there was no enthusiasm in the committee for the project, so that indirectly the committee are not favoring this project by having in the bill an item which it seems will not reach the purchase of the canal. The Agnus Commission several years ago appraised this property at twice the sum the bill carries. That was a disinterested commission, appointed by the Government; but even then no figure could be secured from the company itself. Consequently, in order that the Government should not embark on this enormous expenditure, it seems to me very desirable to leave this item in the bill as it is. If we are really going to take up this inland waterway, let us have money enough to carry it out, and let us have our own project. Do not let us take up somebody's discarded goods here and go ahead on that basis. I want to say, therefore, that I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] will not prevail, in order that in all probability the canal may not be purchased by the Government.

Mr. FREAR. In view of the fact that this item is certain to be increased to $2,500,000 in another body, just as it was four years ago, which may make it possible to purchase the canal, would it not be safer and better to strike it from the bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not agree with the gentleman, because this project has friends on this floor. It has good, conscientious Members supporting it who would support it to the limit. They would support it to the condemnation figure, whatever it might be. Therefore I think this method of practically defeating it is very much better than trying to strike it out. In reference to the amount having been enlarged in some previous bill I take the gentleman's statement for that, but I recall that the item never became a law, and I know that if this bill should go to conference between the two Houses this House never would agree by its conferees to the acceptance of a larger figure than the committee now reports.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWITZER was recognized.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman will pardon me, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I want five minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. I want two minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I want five minutes, although I may not use them.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I differ with my colleague as to the item now pending before the committee in the acquirement of the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal rights. I think the illustrations given by the gentleman from Illinois, in which he compares the future prospective commerce of this canal with other canals, are unfair. I have been informed that the Hennepin Canal across the State of Illinois has not been a success as a great commerce carrier, because it has never connected up the two great waterways and because the depth is only 6 or 7 feet. I am informed that it has been of great benefit to the people engaged in commerce by the effect that it has had on the reduction of railroad rates, especially on the Rock Island system. I understand that system paralleled this canal, and for years it practically held freight rates down lower than the actual cost of carriage in order that the railroad might put the canal out of business. Now, I say that that comparison is unfair. We have canals all through the State of Ohio from 2 to 6 feet in depth that carry no freight to-day, but why should I compare the benefits of the future prospects of this project with those unused canals throughout the State of Ohio.

On the other hand, we have the Ohio River, which has always been a great carrier of freight, and the Monongahela River, which has been canalized. The canalization of some streams has been a success and commerce on the stream has increased from 6,000,000 to 12,000,000 tons annually.

Anyone looking at this project can see at a glance that it connects two great waterways, the Chesapeake Bay and the Delaware Bay, or Delaware River, only a few miles. The commerce to-day is a million tons annually, not 10,000 tons, as it is on the Hennepin Canal, or as nothing on the many little ditches dug, through Ohio.

What is proposed to-day is to increase the depth of this canal to 12 or 15 feet and eliminate the locks and make it a sea-level canal, eliminating the great expense in the future for upkeep. It seems to me that this is something worthy of consideration, especially when you are connecting up the channel which carries commerce between two great cities like Baltimore and Philadelphia.

Now, as to the method of acquiring the canal, I never have been in favor of condemnation proceedings only as a last resort. My experience is, and has led me to the conclusion, that condemnation costs more than when it is acquired by private arrangement or private contract. I believe that an appropriation of $1,300,000 will at least enable the War Department to close some bargain for this canal, and if it is acquired for something like $1,300,000 up to $2,600,000, I have no doubt the price is sufficiently cheap. Of the three routes proposed across this stretch of country, the two paralleling this canal, even at a maximum price, this route is much cheaper than any yet proposed. While I would not resort to condemnation proceedings only as a last resort that can be appealed to, I do think that this project is of sufficient importance, and I think any member of the committee who merely looks at the map will come to the conclusion that it is very desirable and should be embarked upon if it can be done at a reasonable expense.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of expressing especially either approval or disapproval of the item in the bill now under discussion. There are many arguments in favor of the proposition and very many arguments against it. The River and Harbor Committee has recommended it, and I think the House is going to agree to it. I never like to do a thing with subterfuge. I believe in being on the square with Members of the House.

Here is a canal proposition to-day that the committee recommend may be purchased for $1,300,000. In my judgment, if they had recommended the purchase of this canal at $2,600,000, the House would not agree to it. It is paying interest at the rate of 4 per cent on $2,600,000 of bonds. It has not increased its business materially. In the end, probably the canal would go more and more into disuse, because it probably can not maintain itself profitably and pay the interest on its bonds. I think if we buy it for $1,300,000, we are justified in doing it.

But what I want to know is whether it is the intention when this bill leaves this body to have the amount increased from $1,300,000 to $2,600,000, or some such sum, and then have that agreed to in conference, or whether it is proposed to put in the bill a provision that the Government shall condemn the property; because it is perfectly patent to anyone that if the Government condemns the property it will have to pay at least the cost of the bonds now outstanding, the interest on which has always been paid. Four per cent on bonds is not an excessively low rate of interest, and if we condemn this we will have to pay the value of the bonds. If we appropriate $1,300,000, and it stands at $1,300,000, these people will sell the canal for that price, because if they keep it their property depreciates in value.

I stood here when the new Panama Canal Co. made an estimate for what they would sell the Panama Canal to the United States for. I do not remember now whether it was a hundred and forty or a hundred and eighty million dollars, or just what it was, but I do remember that when we got down to brass tacks, although they had said to us repeatedly that they would not sell for any less—when we really got down to brass tacks and authorized the purchase for a certain sum, they took what we offered; and if instead of offering them $40,000,000 we had offered $20,000,000, they would have taken that. This canal company in the end will take whatever we offer.

I would like to know from the gentleman in charge of the bill if it is the intention to increase the offer through the operation of the Senate and the conference committee, and I observe that I do not get any reply.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois can get a reply, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, convictions are very largely influenced by environment. Anyone born and bred in the State of New York and familiar with its canal system can be expected to be favorable to a proper enlargement of the Atlantic coast inland waterway system. Private capital has blazed the way, as it always does, in the construction of the Cape Cod Canal, which is now being successfully and profitably operated. I am not opposed to the construction of this canal, provided it is undertaken upon proper terms, but I fail to realize the distinction which will place upon the State of New Jersey the necessity for procuring at the expense of its citizens the right of way for the construction of the canal from the Delaware River to Raritan Bay, but will permit those to be benefited by the canal connecting the Delaware with the Chesapeake to obtain the means for acquiring the right of way out of the Federal Treasury. Moreover, I wish to dissent from the statement contained in the report of the Army engineers that the construction of this entire canal up to a depth of 12 feet is a proposition of national importance, and the deepening of the channel from 12 to 25 feet is a matter of local importance, and that the deepening to 25 feet or more should only be made in the event of local cooperation. Rather do I take the contrary view, that the channel of 12 feet is a channel primarily in the interest of local commerce, and that when it is deepened to 25 feet it becomes a national industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] who has just taken his seat remarked about the lack of cooperation proposed in connection with the plans of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal as compared to what New Jersey may have to do for the Delaware & Raritan Canal. I want to say to the House that the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Delaware originally took stock in this canal company when the canal was dug some years ago. I merely wanted to reply to the gentleman who has just spoken, and my purpose in asking for time is to call the attention of the House to some of the military and naval uses that this canal may serve. Other gentlemen here to-day have told you of its commercial value, and they have covered every point, but very little has been said concerning the military and naval use to which this canal could be put. In 1906 Gen. Agnus, an Army officer, was chairman of the commission that made a report upon this project, and a great part of that report concerns the military and naval value of this canal. We all know what the Kiel Canal has been to Germany in this war.

If it were not for the Kiel Canal connecting the Baltic and the North Seas, the German battle fleet would not have been of any use to that nation in this war. This is a similar case. If it were in another nation, a canal would be constructed for military and naval uses, notwithstanding any opposition to the contrary, so far as it related to its commercial value. We see before us a stretch of coast line—the Atlantic Coast—about 3,000 miles long. Our battle fleet not only has to defend that coast, but it has to defend the coast line of the Gulf of Mexico, and through the agency of the Panama Canal that same battle fleet is expected to defend the Pacific coast. This Nation has the greatest vulnerable coast line of any first-class power, excepting none. It takes a battle fleet of great proportions to defend it. The Panama Canal divides in two the fleet that is necessary. This project here, if put through, will not cost when completed to a 33-foot channel what one dreadnaught or one battle cruiser would cost. In the Agnus report we find the following language:

A geographical study of the Maryland and Delaware peninsula and the Atlantic coast line of the United States shows that this peninsula is one of the most vulnerable and suitable places for the location of a base of land operations should our Navy be driven from the sea.

This was demonstrated in the War of 1812 in no uncertain manner, when the British burned the very Capitol in which we gentlemen are now sitting. I can not in the few minutes I have call attention to all of the points in this report, but there is another sentence which concerns it very closely and which I desire to quote:

The Civil War developed the enormous value of the present canal as a means of transportation of troops, supplies, and prisoners. While our railroad facilities have greatly increased since that time, it is easily conceivable that in future wars or internal disturbances the proposed ship canal would very likely prove an important adjunct to rail transportation and possibly a vital factor in the campaign, should rail transportation be interrupted by accidents, strikes, or hostile raids.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain that it is a real question of preparedness, outside of the commercial value, and it is one that we should very seriously consider at a time when we are spending many hundreds of millions of dollars upon ships. The amount spent to put this canal through would not represent the loss of one battleship or battle cruiser, should it be lost by reason of its not having the proper means of communication between two of our greatest bays, the Delaware and the Chesapeake, and around which there are likely to be military and naval operations should war ever come.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Does not the argument which the gentleman makes with regard to the question of preparedness apply likewise to the canal between New York and New Jersey?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. It does; and I agree with the naval officers who say that this project from Boston down should be put through as a defensive measure; and the gentleman knows and I know that naval officers are not prone to advocate something for purely commercial purposes. It is really a defensive measure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield that three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in that three minutes I want to refer to the commercial importance of this project. That was the reason for the introduction of the original bill, but the Agnus report in 1907 indicated that commerce around about this section of the country was running all the way from fifty to ninety million tons. There are but two railroads that parallel the canal, and the tolls now charged upon the canal are equal to the tolls paid upon the railroads; and in spite of the fact that the tolls paid on the canal equal those paid on the railroads, the canal does a million tons of business a year. We can sometimes get quicker service for heavy freight over the canal to-day than they can upon the railroads. That much for the commercial side of the question.

Now for the national-defense side. I will quote from Admiral Benson, who only yesterday was designated to take the place of the lamented Admiral Dewey at the head of the Naval Board. In an address upon this subject, the admiral, after referring to the strategic situation and the fact that diplomacy does not always count in matters of warfare, said:

For this reason it is barely possible that the time may come—though we sincerely hope it will not—when it might be necessary for our vessels to keep in harbors and move from one to the other. Our coasts might be assailed by an overwhelming naval force before we could prepare ourselves fully to repel it. That being the case, you will easily understand what an advantage it would be if we could move our ships from one part of the coasts to the other. For instance, if the fleet was mobilized in Hampton Roads—and we had a canal connecting that waterway with Delaware Bay—

Here [illustrating]— our fleet, or portions of it, could move from Hampton Roads to Delaware Bay.

Here is an attacking force outside [indicating on map]; our fleet is inside. The admiral wants to move on to this bay—the Delaware—to reach the opposing fleet in the rear if necessary, and so all along the coast at these other three openings. He says:

Again, if we had a canal leading from Delaware Bay into New York Bay, we could move on still farther with our battleships through Hell Gate into Long Island Sound.

You will readily understand that in order to offset our advantage in the way of such canals the enemy would be compelled to have four times the force that he would otherwise have to have in order to prevent ships coming out and attacking him successfully. That seems to be so obvious that it needs no discussion whatever. [Applause.] But regardless of the fact this condition might never obtain, the question of sending supplies from one point to another is of very vital importance to the Navy. We have navy yards and gun factories, for instance, here in Washington. At the Naval Gun Foundry here nearly all our guns for the Navy are constructed. They are proved down here at the proving grounds on the Potomac River, a few miles below. Practically all of our powder that we use in those guns is made down here at Indianhead, about 14 miles below the city. A great many of the projectiles we use are made here on the Potomac River.

In addition to that, we have at Norfolk one of our principal naval stations. Thus you see that in case we were building ships on the Delaware River—and there has been a wonderful development in the shipbuilding industry there recently, and also a great development of the Philadelphia Navy Yard, and a greater development is bound to come in the near future—we might want to send our guns, or we might want to send powder or various munitions of war from over in this immediate vicinity or from Norfolk to Philadelphia; and a small enemy cruiser hovering off the coast might be able to prevent our doing so unless we had a system of communication along the inside route that would allow us to send these munitions of war where needed. The same thing would be true with regard to communicating through from Delaware Bay to New York City, and it is also desirable to continue the same system of deeper inland waterways along the entire eastern coast.

It may not be known to you that for some years now we have been supplying our naval stations along this eastern coast with coal for their use from colliers, because it was impracticable to get the coal carried in the ordinary way; so the Navy colliers had to supply the navy yards with coal sufficient to run them.

* * * * * * *

Now, as I said in the beginning, we have a great number of small craft, and our coast is so formed that its defense must necessarily depend very largely on the submarines and the smaller craft; and in order to utilize what we have to the fullest extent there should be some means of moving this craft from one part of the coast to the other.

Our national means of defense, particularly from Key West north, would be through our inland waterways by our submarines. Not that the submarines are not able to go outside, for they are, and even our coast submarines are able to go to sea and cruise a hundred miles off shore successfully. They can go even farther; but what I refer to is the fact that they want to be protected. We do not want them exposed to the attacks of the enemy on the outside in case we desire to move them from one point of the coast to another, or in order that they may go out from various openings and attack the enemy. So you can readily see the tremendous advantage that improved inland waterways would be to the Navy in the event of war in moving submarines and destroyers through the inland waterways.

Of course, anything that helps commerce helps the Navy; anything that helps the Navy helps commerce; and whatever helps both helps the country.

This is the way Admiral Benson felt about it.

Here are the four points of attack to which the admiral refers: One is at the entrance of Long Island Sound, one at the entrance of New York Bay, one at the entrance of Delaware Bay, and one at the entrance of the Chesapeake Bay. Make the inside passages ample and safe and we will have four times the advantage in attacking the enemy first, and we can move from point to point for repairs or ammunition or supplies. So says Admiral Benson. Then there is the question as to the ability of the railroads to carry munitions in time of war. They might be disabled or absolutely destroyed along this coast, and then there may be strikes upon the railroads just when we need the railroads to carry munitions of war. In such an event the admiral says it would be an advantage; it would be absolutely essential to the welfare of the Nation for our boats to pass inland from point to point. And, gentlemen, all that is asked now is to give this project a start by connecting up these two great bays of the Atlantic seaboard. The Navy men want this done, the Army men want this done as a measure of national defense, and the great commercial interests of the country want it done because it will afford cheaper transportation and bring about that communication which has been so long denied. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Baltimore Harbor and Channels, Md.: For maintenance of Patapsco River and channel to Baltimore, including channel of approach at York Spit, Chesapeake Bay, $104,000; for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 799, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $250,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to prosecute maintenance work in the inner harbor in accordance with the recommendation submitted in said document; in all, $354,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, first, that no contract for maintenance or improvement of harbors shall be let unless competitive bids are received from at least three bidders and bids shall not be accepted until personally approved by the Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman ask that his amendment be inserted?

Mr. FREAR. At the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers his amendment, to be inserted at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, in the case of large harbors which carry a great deal of commerce I have never yet proposed a change of the recommendations of the Army engineers. I would not do so in this case, because I realize this is a great harbor carrying a great commerce. However, last night I presented to the House, and it appears this morning in the RECORD, the dredgers' agreement which was published before in the RECORD. It appears on page 1995 of the RECORD of yesterday, showing the procedure among the dredging companies to allot contracts in the past without having genuine competitive bidding, and I called attention last night to the further fact that the company which had headquarters in the city of Baltimore is the company whose president was once president of the dredgers' association which in past years allotted contracts. I further called attention to the fact that the company had all the contracts, I believe, without exception, in the Baltimore district except one, for dredging, and all those cases where there was dredged sand and mud they received 26½ cents, level price, and the only other company that did dredging in that district received 9 cents for practically the same kind of work, so far as can be judged.

In order to have genuine competitive bidding, Mr. Chairman, there must be more than one bidder. And it appears, so far as we can judge from the record——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman looked up to see what has been the policy of these various companies? Have more than one submitted bids heretofore?

Mr. FREAR. There is nothing before us that can show in regard to that. The Army engineers can disclose, but even if they did disclose that, from the very fact that the dredgers' association has controlled in the past, it would bring no return, because those bids might be for the purpose of making a show; but the determination would eventually be from the one that controlled the pool, if that procedure is still adopted. In Baltimore this one company has exclusive dredging contracts.

Mr. COX. For Baltimore Harbor?

Mr. FREAR. For Baltimore Harbor, just as it has to-day for other points in the Baltimore district, with one exception. I believe that is right.

Mr. COX. How many companies are engaged in this line of work along the Atlantic seaboard?

Mr. FREAR. Dredging companies?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I have that in the RECORD. If the gentleman will turn to page 1996 of the RECORD he will see that I caused to be inserted there the names of a number of dredging companies that were making contributions or that were referred to as making contributions to the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. I can read those, if desired, but they appear there.

Mr. COX. Is the National Rivers and Harbors Congress a permanent organization? What is it, anyhow? What is its purpose and object? What does it seek to obtain?

Mr. FREAR. In its charter or constitution it says it is in favor of a policy, not a project, to have an appropriation of $50,000,000 made annually by the Federal Congress.

Mr. COX. How is it obtained?

Mr. FREAR. Presumably by contributions received from dredgers and various individuals throughout the country. And I have furnished the subscription list in the past to show——

Mr. COX. Voluntary contributions, or depending on the success in obtaining the amount of the contract?

Mr. FREAR. I take it that they are voluntary so far as the subscription list I filed and put in the RECORD two years ago.

Mr. COX. Then the purpose is to divide up the territory and divide up the contracts?

Mr. FREAR. The purpose of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, as shown on page 1994 and claimed in their report, is to divide up their appropriations. This Congress apparently is only used as an instrument under their direction. They are the ones that divide the appropriations among the States. The gentleman will notice on page 1994 the amount subscribed to the National Rivers and Harbors Congress by States is put side by side with the amount received from the Federal Congress of the United States, and 1 per cent is shown by their report, all that is necessary to receive a proportionate amount of $100 from the Government.

Mr. COX. Let me ask the gentleman: Did the gentleman himself compile this data on page 1994?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no. That is taken from their official report, in which they make that statement.

Mr. COX. I see in this report that Pennsylvania contributed $4,295 for the maintenance of something, and got back in return $4,837,745.

Mr. FREAR. That report shows in the comparative table, placed just as it is here.

Mr. COX. I would like to know, if the gentleman can give me the information, and I am seeking information solely, what is the concrete purpose of these appropriations made by these dredging concerns?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. What are these contributions made for?

Mr. FREAR. The contributions by the dredgers?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. That is for the support of the Rivers and Harbors Congress. It purports to be, so far as the subscription list is submitted, for the support of this lobby, this river and harbor lobby, that claims to have something to do with the distribution of appropriations throughout the country.

Mr. COX. And the Rivers and Harbors Congress is supposed to bring pressure to bear on this Congress in order to get it to make appropriations for the various projects?

Mr. FREAR. That is a practical admission. I do not know how they would proceed to do otherwise. That appears in their annual report.

So, Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment adopted. Surely there can be nothing objectionable in that, in order to insure active competition among dredgers.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Would not the amendment have a tendency to exclude the Government from securing three bidders on any work on a project at all?

Mr. FREAR. I think that would be a logical result, but it seems to me we would try to secure genuine bids in order that the project might be carried out.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If there was such a combination, there would not be any bids.

Mr. FREAR. We ought to discover if a combination exists, because the dredgers' association, holding up the Government of the United States——

Mr. SPARKMAN. If one exists, I am not in sympathizing with it.

Mr. FREAR. I understand the gentleman does not.

Mr. SPARKMAN. This amendment, if adopted, may cause the project to suffer.

Mr. FREAR. The Government would suffer if we are to accept the figures of one dredging company.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the War Department can be trusted to take care of that.

Mr. FREAR. They have been taking care of these things with that unknown agreement in force in past years apparently, and that agreement has divided with the dredgers in the past the allotment of these contracts.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We put on an amendment on the floor of the House last year designed to protect against just that kind of situation.

Mr. FREAR. It could not reach that, if the chairman please, because the gentleman will observe that unless you have a Government dredge working along in that neighborhood there is no way of comparison.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Your amendment might stop the work entirely.

Mr. FREAR. That is true, unless you can have genuine competition. The purpose is to insist that we have genuine competition throughout the country on these dredging contracts, and particularly at Baltimore, where the evidence goes to show that this one company controls everything in the Baltimore district, as well as contracts far outside.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] attempts to show that there is an association which allots these contracts. The gentleman does not tell the House, however, that the letter to which he refers was dated on March 13, 1901, nearly 16 years ago, and that that organization went out of existence in 1905 or 1906, and that it has had no existence since that time.

The gentleman from Wisconsin also attempts to show that there is no competition. I have what data I could get from the engineers this morning, and the contract that is referred to principally by the gentleman is in connection with the rivers and harbors on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. The contract price there is $41,946.25. There were four bidders. The contract was awarded at 26½ cents per cubic yard. The highest bid was $45,892.50. The Maryland Dredging Co., which received the contract, bid nearly $4,000 less than the highest bidders. It is a small contract involving heavy expense in moving and installing the plant, all of which made the cost greater. Now, in the James River case the estimated cost was $39,000. There were four bidders—the Norfolk Dredging Co., the A. B. Walls & Sons, the P. Sanford Ross Co., and the Maryland Dredging Co. The Maryland Dredging Co. got that contract for $34,590, nearly $4,500 less than the estimated cost. The highest bid was $52,350.

In the Anacostia River case the estimate was $39,000. The Maryland Dredging Co. bid $44,000 for the contract, 5½ cents per cubic yard. There were five bidders. The highest bid was 8 cents, and the next lowest bid was 6 cents per cubic yard.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Why is it that the Maryland Dredging Co. received 5½ cents while the other concern that is doing the work on the Anacostia River received only 5 cents?

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is a pertinent question. In many of these contracts the material is soft mud, while in other cases it may be sand or gravel or rock. Take the Delaware River, for example, of which the gentleman spoke yesterday. The gentleman spoke of the Maryland Dredging Co. getting 14.7 cents per cubic yard while another company got only 9 cents. The truth is, the Maryland Dredging Co. is using a dipper dredging machine, lifting hard material, while another company is using a suction dredge and pumping the mud on the shore. It depends upon the kind of material you are dredging, whether it is soft mud or sand or gravel or rock, and it also depends on how far you have to carry the material that is dredged. That also enters into the cost of these matters.

Now, in the Delaware River case, the Maryland Dredging Co. bid 16.2 cents. There were five bidders. The highest was 19 cents. The total contract was $46,980 and the Army estimate was $55,000.

Mr. FREAR. Was there not a contract with the Maryland Dredging Co. for 24 cents?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think so. That river was divided up into three sections. One section was mud and another was heavy material and a third section was a section where there was some rock. As I said, the price depends upon the class of material to be moved and where it is to be deposited.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can get some agreement as to the length of debate.

Mr. FREAR. I only want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Maryland want?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I asked for five minutes' time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto end in 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto end in 12 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin has laid considerable stress upon that letter to which I referred, but the gentleman has not called attention to the fact that that was something that happened 16 years ago. It was a circular letter and it was fully explained to the Rivers and Harbors Committee at that time, when Mr. Burton was chairman.

Now, the Maryland Dredging Co. is presided over by Mr. Frank A. Furst, and it is a large organization. Mr. Frank Furst is one of the best and most respected citizens of the State of Maryland. His word goes with the people of that State. He stands as high for character and credit as any citizen we have, and the intimation that he would enter into any arrangement by which contracts would be apportioned to the detriment of the Government is impossible for any citizen of Maryland to believe.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Is it not a fact that in this statement he admitted the allotments were made at that time?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No. I do not think that statement applies in the sense the gentleman ascribes, any more than the statement that a banquet was given by Mr. Furst at which Congressmen were guests be a proof that there was any impropriety or corruption connected with it. I was told by Mr. Furst that there never was a Congressman at the alleged banquet. It was not what you would call a regular banquet. It was simply a few men gathered around a table to discuss business affairs and who at the same time enjoyed their dinner.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I suggest to the gentleman that there is a convention of workingmen to be held in Washington soon, at which they may also have a banquet?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman speaks of the River and Harbor Congress. Certain Members of Congress are members of that association, which has for its purpose the development of rivers and harbors and not for the allotment of contracts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We may have an invitation extended to the gentleman to speak to the convention.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; I may have the pleasure of being delegated to invite the gentleman to Baltimore.

Mr. FREAR. Is it not directly intimated by their annual report that they have some control over appropriations? Has the gentleman investigated that?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No. I am not a member of the River and Harbor Congress, although some Representatives and Senators are. I think it is somewhat like our Atlantic Deep Waterways Association, which is working for the construction of this canal, and the Rivers and Harbors Congress is working for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country, not to the injury of the Government, but for the betterment of the conditions of the country and the traffic arrangements throughout the land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There being 50,000 miles of navigable and nonnavigable rivers in the country, about one-half of which are nonnavigable, does the gentleman think it improper for any association of men interested in public development to advocate the improvement of the nonnavigable rivers?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I find that men in all walks of life are advocating the development of those things in which they are interested. I look upon the Rivers and Harbors Congress as of great benefit to this Congress, because of the varied information which they gather.

Mr. HULBERT. Is this document which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] are referring to the communication that appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at page 1995, as a report of the board of directors of the Atlantic & Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association, dated March 13, 1901?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; nearly 16 years ago.

Mr. HULBERT. Sixteen years ago. I notice in the RECORD the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin, reading as follows:

I submit a statement secretly issued by a dredgers' organization, and placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a speech made September 29, 1914.

Can the gentleman from Maryland tell me, or will he permit the gentleman from Wisconsin, if we will do so, to state when this statement was secretly issued by the dredgers' organization, as it seems very singular that we have not learned of it until 16 years after the date that it bears?

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULBERT. Certainly.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman had been a Member of Congress and had read the RECORD, he would have discovered that this was inserted two years ago when first received, and a resolution was introduced in Congress asking for an investigation at that time, to ascertain whether or not such a secret agreement for the allotment of contracts existed at that time or at this time.

Mr. HULBERT. Who introduced the resolution to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. FREAR. I introduced that resolution.

Mr. HULBERT. Has the gentleman ever demanded or secured a hearing upon that resolution?

Mr. FREAR. The resolution was referred to the River and Harbor Committee, if I remember correctly, and if the resolution had been considered of interest by the committee I take it that they would have asked for a hearing. I submit that was all I could do.

Mr. HULBERT. The gentleman knows I have not been at all backward in my attitude in regard to these matters.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no.

Mr. HULBERT. The gentleman has never sought to interest me in it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I hope this colloquy will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It has taken place in the gentleman's time, and the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I did not know that the gentleman's question was going to extend into a speech. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no objection to the extension.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. As to the amendment which the gentleman proposes applying to Baltimore, there is no telling when we might get that work done. I was talking to the Engineer's Office, and I asked them about the competitive bids. They said that they had had a great many competitive bids until the last six months, but in the last six months there was so much private work going on, which seems to pay a better price than Government work, that they had not had as many bidders as formerly. If you put that amendment in there, and if we do not have the number of bidders that the gentleman speaks of, then the Baltimore work will be at a standstill; and this is a proposition which we have had before Congress for some years, a proposition which Baltimore absolutely needs, one which is necessary for the business that has developed in that great city in the last few years. The extension of this channel is necessary, particularly at Curtis Bay, where the Government colliers can not load to their full capacity with coal for the warships which you are building; and until that channel is of sufficient depth the colliers which supply a large proportion of the coal for the warships on the Atlantic seaboard will continue to go out loaded to only a part of their capacity, much to the loss of the Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman says this dredge owners' association went out of existence in what year?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Nineteen hundred and five or 1906.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Ten or eleven years ago?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Eleven years ago.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman that never until he made the statement he has just been making did I have any idea that this dredgers' association went out of existence so long ago. I do not think one Member of the House, outside of the two gentlemen who made the statement, knew that that was a fact. In 1914, when that statement was made here, everybody supposed that the dredgers' association was still in existence.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, no; it has not been in existence for the past 11 years.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], if they have any application or purpose whatever, mean that he charges a dredgers' association which has been out of existence for more than 10 years with combining or conspiring improperly to influence Congress. That is a serious charge, and the gentleman ought to have substantial evidence before making it as to any men engaged in private activities. If the gentleman has any purpose, he will probably have us infer that the United States Army Engineers, by reason of lack of skill or lack of integrity or lack of a disposition to preserve the rights of the United States Government, were improperly influenced by these dredgers. Does he mean to make that statement? The gentleman refers to the National River and Harbor Congress, a voluntary organization composed of delegates which attend its annual meetings held in this city, from substantially every State in the Union. Among them are reputable gentlemen from the State of Wisconsin, and yet the gentleman in his remarks about that association, if he has any purpose at all, would have us believe that these business men from all over the United States, presided over by the distinguished and honorable Member of the Senate of the United States, Senator RANSDELL, are engaged in improperly influencing the Congress of the United States. If he does not mean that, what does he mean?

Now, with reference to the amendment he offers I call the attention of the House to the river and harbor act of 1888, which contains this statute, and which is applicable at the present time:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to apply the money herein and hereafter appropriated for improvement of rivers and harbors, other than surveys, estimates, and gaugings, in carrying on the various works, by contract or otherwise, as may be most economical and advantageous to the Government. Where said works are done by contract such contract shall be made after sufficient public advertisement for proposals, in such manner and form as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and such contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidders, accompanied by such securities as the Secretary of War shall require, conditioned for the faithful prosecution and completion of the work according to such contract.

In every one of these proposals the right is always reserved to reject any and all bids. So we have sufficient law at the present time to accomplish the result desired, and makes the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin unnecessary. The only question here is whether the Secretary of War and the Corps of Engineers have the skill and integrity and ability to preserve the rights of the Government and to administer the law expending the appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I believe I was to have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. HULBERT. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt it was more fortunate for the people of the twenty-first congressional district of New York that I did not represent that district in 1914, because my predecessor, the Hon. Henry George, jr., was a far abler and better man than I can ever hope to be. But in the two years that I have been a Member of this House, I have been endeavoring to familiarize myself with matters connected with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; and although I have been diligent and given a great deal of study to matters connected with it, I never knew until the gentleman referred to it yesterday of the existence of the paper that has been referred to, nor to the resolution of investigation introduced by him before I became a Member of Congress. I hope I may profitably spend the two minutes allotted to me in getting further information.

I observe on page 1995 of the RECORD, in the article that the gentleman inserted yesterday, a series of subheads. At the bottom of the first column is "In union there is strength." In the next column is a subhead, "Quarreling over spoils," and below that is another subhead, "To throw all resources on projects." I would like to ask as a matter of information of the gentleman from Wisconsin whether those subheads were in the statement submitted by him or put in by him in order to add emphasis to the article which he has submitted to this House?

Mr. FREAR. They were inserted by myself as evidence of what the contract or agreement purported to be.

Mr. HULBERT. I suppose the subheads on page 1996, "Dredgers neglected the pork barrel" and "Board is to work for pork barrels," were also inserted by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. Does the gentleman know who wrote the article in the first instance?

Mr. HULBERT. I do not know anything about the article except the information contained in the RECORD, but I submit that if an article is inserted in the RECORD, having been prepared by a gentleman whose name is attached to it, that it is misleading for a Member of the House to insert subheads without putting in parentheses or indicate otherwise that the subheads are his.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is the gentleman familiar with the system that is pursued in the office of a good many publications of this country of putting headlines over an article that by insinuation and inuendo reflects on the character or reputation of a man when the reading of the article does not bear it out?

Mr. HULBERT. I am not aware of the practice to the extent that I believe it is a system. If the gentleman from Washington has found any evidence that there is a system, the House of Representatives is the last body which ought to approve and adopt such a system here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired and all time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rockhall, Queenstown, Claiborne, and Cambridge Harbors, and Chester, Choptank, Warwick, Wicomico, Pocomoke, La Trappe, and Manokin Rivers, and Tyaskin Creek, Md.: For maintenance, $10,000; completing improvement of Wicomico River, Md., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1509, Sixty-third Congress, third session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $17,100; in all, $27,100.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment to follow the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 5, page 11, insert: "That no contract for maintenance or improvement shall be let unless competitive bids are received from at least three bidders and bids shall not be accepted until personally approved by the Secretary of War."

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to offer any other amendment of this kind. This is one for a small contract and the other one that I offered was for a large contract. But I wish to reply to some statements that have been made here by these Members of Congress who are defending this dredgers' association that formerly allotted contracts to defeat the ends of justice and seeking to get money out of the Federal Treasury by allotment. Was that right? Do you think it was honest? Did the Army engineers know it? The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] says that I am charging the Army engineers with influencing Members of Congress. He is always defending the Army engineers when there is no necessity for it. Did they know of the secret agreement; did they know that the dredgers were allotting these contracts in these districts? I have no knowledge of the subject, but am sure they did not. The question is, Do you know it to-day here? The statement was put in the RECORD precisely as it was put in back in 1914.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that I do not think the criticism was intended to convey the impression that this House would condone any such agreement as that.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no. I take it the chairman is right in that respect.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It was directed to the fact that the combination, if any, had gone out of existence some 10 or 15 years before. The discussion was therefore merely academic.

Mr. FREAR. The chairman would have the right to come to that conclusion and so would all others were it not for the fact that all of these contracts suddenly come into existence around this particular headquarters at Baltimore, and the fact that the official is the same who existed at that time. Who can tell us that the dredgers' association has gone out of existence? Who says it has? Who knows?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, 30 or 40 years ago there were many conditions different from what there are now.

Mr. FREAR. According to the gentleman's understanding, it has gone out of existence.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman tell me some of those contracts that the Maryland Dredging Co. has had around Baltimore.

Mr. FREAR. The ones in existence to-day.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is only one contract in the Patapsco River. The truth is that the Maryland Dredging Co. has only dredged the Craighill Channel around Fort McHenry, and it is not doing any dredging there except some small contracts.

Mr. FREAR. There has been no charge that the Army engineers were connected with this, but I do say apparently the Army engineers were deceived by this association when they allotted contracts, and that is borne out by this statement or agreement.

As to the subheads of the article, those were put in in the original article, I presume, because it was inserted here just as it was inserted there, presumably with those subheads at that time. No one will believe that that was intended to change in any way the character of the statement that the association was supposed to allot these dredgers' contracts. Now, as to the gentleman who defends the Rivers and Harbors Congress, I say that that is a lobby. I say that it is for the securing of $50,000,000 in appropriations every year. That was a part of their constitution which has been quoted in the past. Here was a statement they filed. I do not ask you to take my conclusions. The statement which they filed is shown on page 1994, in which they show appropriations received from the Government by the various States and then that organization puts right up in juxtaposition the amount of money that is paid toward the association. Is not that true? Can you form any other conclusion? That is taken from their report. If that is true, what is your conclusion in regard to what they meant? What other conclusion could you come to but that for the purpose of securing appropriations from the Federal Congress it was necessary to belong to that association and to make contributions? Is not that a fair inference? Is not that the only conclusion that could be reached? That is taken from their official records, not from any statements upon my part. So I say that the criticism was not fairly directed when it is said that I am saying these things. I am taking the official record of that organization.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Has the gentleman any evidence that there was a combination between the dredging firms?

Mr. FREAR. Nothing except what I have given, and their own statement that there has been in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM rose.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I asked the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to name some of the contracts that the Maryland Dredging Co. had around Baltimore Harbor, and he has failed to name them.

Mr. FREAR. Only what the engineer's report shows.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Because he can not. The Maryland Dredging Co. has not had any contracts around Baltimore for some time—not since it dredged the Craighill Channel at Fort McHenry. It has a small contract for maintenance in the Patapsco River, and the facts about that are these: There were three bidders. The Maryland Dredging Co. bid 8¾ cents per cubic yard and the highest bidder was 15 cents. The Maryland Dredging Co. got that little contract in the Baltimore channel. Can anyone imagine this particular company doing the work for much less than 8¾ cents? In the work done about Baltimore, I think it was the Coastwise Dredging Co., of Norfolk which got the contract, and the Maryland Dredging Co. has not had any work with the exception of this small contract that I tell you about and it got that at 8¾ cents. The truth about the dredging business is that a large number of the dredgers who have been doing Government work in this country have gone broke in the last year or so because of the high wages and the high cost of coal and other things which enter into contracts. So that there is not very much profit in the work at this time. The Maryland Dredging Co., however, has a large force and they have a number of dredges and are doing the business on a large scale, and are thus able to do it more cheaply and make some money out of it, but the small men who have attempted the work have gone broke in nearly every instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Norfolk Harbor and channels, Va.: For improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 605, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $270,000. The unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for improvement of channel to Norfolk, Va., is hereby made available for continuing improvement of said channel in accordance with the report submitted in said document.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph just read be passed over to be returned to later with a view to possible amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the paragraph just read on page 11 be passed over to be returned to later. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

James River, Va.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $56,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, lines 8 and 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, strike out all of lines 8 and 9.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect that my amendment will go very far, but I wish to present this fact to the committee, that this project is one which the Army engineers, the men we quote so frequently, I understand, decided should be abandoned, so far as the 18-foot project was concerned, the last session, and so reported. However, the House in its wisdom and Congress overruled the Army engineers and insisted that this project should be carried on. At that time I voted against it, believing it was improper, and I simply raise the question again.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not at liberty to state how he voted in reference to this item.

Mr. FREAR. Why?

Mr. HULBERT. In committee?

Mr. FREAR. No; I did not say in the committee. Appropriations have reached $3,440,000. That has been the appropriation for this project, and the engineers' report shows that $191,735 is on hand. The proposal here is for a small appropriation of $56,000. The amount estimated to complete this project to its full depth is $2,797,000 more. This is one of those other projects, which has been explained, for which the Maryland Dredging Co. had the contract. There is a good commerce, a large commerce, at Richmond, but Army engineers, to whom we appeal on all these cases for advice, have said that the original project ought not to be continued. We are paying at this place a large sum per square yard to excavate rock on this project. Nothing is paid toward the project by Richmond or the district that is to be benefited. We are carrying a channel way up into Virginia; that is, the Government is doing it. Now, when it comes to improving channels down on the Texas coast we say to the people there, "You contribute and do your share. You make a payment if we are going to carry a canal or a river or an improvement; you must make a contribution to it." Here we say the Government will put in $2,700,000 more, in addition to the $3,400,000. I understand Army engineers have recommended the discontinuance of the full project and only ask for maintenance. For that reason I made the motion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to say to the committee that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is mistaken in two statements. First, the engineers have not recommended a discontinuance of the original project, as stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin. They have recommended a modification of that project, and I need not accentuate to the committee that there is a very great difference between a modification and a discontinuance of the project. Secondly, I desire to say to the committee that the city of Richmond has been a large contributor to the execution of the original project incident to the deepening of James River, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the contrary. According to the Engineer's report the total sum expended under the existing project by the Federal Government is $2,485,296.42, and the city of Richmond has voluntarily contributed and expended for the improvement of the channel and the construction of public terminals the sum of $1,044,476.65, in round numbers nearly half of what has been contributed by the Federal Government.

Mr. Chairman, another word. James River is a great tidal water stream, extending over a hundred miles from the city of Richmond to its mouth. Its commerce is considerable, being valued for the year 1916 at $51,899,841, as against $33,523,461 for 1915, and I am conservative in believing that the commerce for 1917 will exceed in value the figures just given.

The report of the engineers suggesting a modification in the project of 1884 I will not now discuss, save to say to the committee that there has been no consideration given to any economic or commercial fact that underlies or supports the original project. Indeed, I venture to think that the engineers would never have suggested such modification of the existing project had they made an investigation not only of the existing commerce but of a far larger commerce which has been denied access to the river and the city of Richmond by reason of the failure of the Government to deepen this river in conformity with the plan and the plain mandate of Congress.

I have appeared several times before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors about this matter. The committee has also given hearings to citizens of my district, and the committee on one or two occasions have gone over all or some portion of the river itself. I welcome the fullest personal investigation by the committee, and, if possible, by the House itself, and would await with confidence the verdict of such an investigation.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Does this bill provide, or is it contemplated that the appropriation here made is to be used in accordance with the modified plan or in accordance with the former plan?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, it was the intention of the committee, I will say to the gentleman, not to interfere with this project one way or the other. The question of adopting the modification, or inserting the language in the bill that would adopt the modification, was discussed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and it was determined not to take that course. I will say further that this appropriation is of such an amount that its expenditure will come under either project, the old project or the modified project, should Congress later on conclude to proceed under the former or the latter.

Mr. TILSON. Then, who will determine how it is to be used, whether in accordance with the original plan or the modification of the plan?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Congress later on, if it desires to proceed in accordance with the modification recommended. In the meantime the sum will be used in a way not inconsistent with either plan. I want to say further that it is the purpose of the committee in the near future to inspect the river and investigate the project for themselves. They were not entirely satisfied with the report of the engineers nor fully with the statements made by parties who came before us in the interest of the improvement, and we wanted to go and see for ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We did not have time to go during this session of Congress and make the investigation the committee desired to make. That is an important work and we do not want to do any injustice to the project, to the peolpe there, or to the Government. Hence it was thought best to make the appropriation just as we have and under the old project, but of such an amount that its expenditure would be consistent with either.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My construction of the action of the committee is that this appropriation is made under the old project and not under the modified plan. There is only an appropriation of $56,000 for maintenance, an insignificant and negligible sum. There is justifiable criticism of the way the money has been appropriated.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is not now the intention of the committee to adopt this modified project, but to leave the matter open for future consideration.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Let me get that clear, then. I understand from the chairman that the committee puts this construction on it: That this appropriation is in no wise a committal to the modified suggestions of the engineers.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I just wished to get that clear for the RECORD. I do not care to take up any further time. On some other occasion I may give the committee or the House my views in more extensive form.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On January 16, 1917:

H. R. 1093. An act for the relief of James Anderson.

On January 18, 1917:

H. R. 10007. An act for the relief of William H. Woods.

RIVERS AND HARBORS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tangier Channel, Va.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 107, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $16,434.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, strike out the paragraph, lines 13, 14, 15, and 16.

Mr. FREAR. In connection with the last matter which was discussed, the James River, I only wish to say that the statement of the chairman that they overruled the Army engineers and refused to consider the modified project was the matter I had in mind, and my amendment to strike out was based upon that fact. If the modified project had been accepted there would have been no question but that we were following their judgment in the matter. In this project before us, which was contained in the bill four years ago, it is a small matter. The last one possibly was open to criticism fully as much as the one that is before us. That is a project that carries only $16,000, but there is a point in it I wish to call attention to.

On page 7 it states:

Unfavorable reports as to result of preliminary examinations made with a view to dredging a channel to this part of the island were made in 1891 and 1899.

And it mentions the Chief of Engineer's reports.

They continued to press their claims down here on this island for some time, until finally the district officer recommended in House Document No. 107 of the Sixty-third Congress as follows:

From the facts and reasons above stated, I am of opinion that Chesapeake Bay, with a view to providing a suitable channel at Tangier, Va., is worthy of relief to the extent of a channel 4 feet deep at mean low water and 40 feet wide, at an estimated cost of $8,525. The anchorage basin is not recommended at this time because of the proportionally large cost of the improvement including it. It is thought that if such an anchorage be found necessary, local interests should either provide it or contribute to its construction.

Now, remember the Army engineers originally refused to recommend this project, but a district officer later said that if they would contribute one-half, then it would be a proper item to put in.

Immediately following that, after the Army engineers had reported that there should be a local contribution on that subject, the board took up the subject and made its final recommendation, as follows:

The improvement * * * is deemed advisable so far as to secure an available channel depth of 5 feet and a channel width of 50 feet * * * with an anchorage basis 400 feet by 400 feet of the same depth * * * at an estimated cost of $16,434 for first construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. I read further:

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports, I concur in general with the views of the district officer, the division engineer, and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and therefore, in carrying out the instructions of Congress, I report as follows: That the improvement by the United States of Chesapeake Bay with a view to providing a suitable channel at Tangier, Va., is deemed advisable so far as to secure an available channel depth of 5 feet and a channel width of 50 feet increased at entrances and on curves, from Tangier Sound to Tangier, with an anchorage basis 400 feet by 400 feet of the same depth, following in general the methods described in the report of the district officer, at an estimated cost of $16,434 for first construction, this estimate being based on the supposition that the construction will, as now seems desirable and advantageous, be prosecuted under a first appropriation of the entire amount of the estimate.

That is signed by W. H. Bixby, Chief of Engineers, United States Army. In other words, notwithstanding the district officer recommended a contribution on this particular project, the Chief of Engineers and the board wiped it out and said that the Government could do it all.

Now, I presented that matter when this same project was up under the old bill, as I recollect, and, of course, there are some statements on the subject rather disparging of the project. I do not care to repeat them. There is some property owned by the steamboat company and piers which were used by the railway company for steamboats. I ask that the item be stricken out because the original condition as recommended by the district engineer was not complied with.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks to which I recently addressed myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C.: Continuing improvement, $1,000,000: Provided, That the route of the waterway may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be modified in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1478, Sixty-third Congress, third session: And provided further, That not more than $75,000 shall be expended in acquiring the necessary rights of way between Albermarle Sound and Pungo River.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of the committee, and particularly do I want to call the attention of the country, to a fact that does not appear in the RECORD in reference to these items, and to the attitude of my friend across the aisle, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Frequently during the early part of this debate the gentleman stated, in defending his attitude in reference to the bill, that when the vote was taken upon the last bill there were 141 Members who voted with him, and he refers to that to show that he does not stand alone in his opposition to river and harbor bills, and that he is in reality representing a large minority of this body. I have been sitting here most of the day. I was absent at the time the vote was taken upon the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, so I can not speak as to that vote; but with that single exception, unless I am very much mistaken, on every vote taken here this afternoon the gentleman from Wisconsin has voted alone. There has been one vote in favor of his amendment, his own, and the rest of the House have voted against him. I think for the benefit of the country that fact ought to go into the RECORD, that the country ought to know the gentleman from Wisconsin is standing alone, and that if he is right in his contention then all the rest of the Members of this House are wrong. I simply want that to go into the RECORD so that the country may know what support the gentleman has here among his colleagues in most of his attacks upon the items in this bill.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the last remark made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], I do not indulge in these personal remarks. It is immaterial to me whether the vote is with me or not. Possibly on the final roll call there will be no one voting against this bill. I realize that 80 new projects have been added to the bill, and that men think very much of those projects. I could give the names of Members—I will not do that—who are quoted as saying that if their new projects did not go into the bill they would not vote for it. I know the interest that Members have, and it does not make any difference how they may vote eventually. I do believe that this bill will never become a law, and that is the thing I am anxious to impress on the House, under present conditions.

Now, referring to this particular project, it is one on which we have appropriated and are appropriating to-day $2,800,000. It is well known as the Norfolk and Beaufort waterway. There is $1,035,305 on hand. This bill asks for $1,000,000 more at this time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to assert a moment ago that this bill will never become a law.

Mr. FREAR. No; I did not assert it. I said I did not believe it would.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Has the gentleman any inside information on that subject?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, no. If the gentleman wants to know why——

Mr. SPARKMAN. The votes here do not indicate that.

Mr. FREAR. The votes here do not; but if the gentleman wants to know why I think so, it is because it is my conviction that under present circumstances and the condition of the Federal Treasury this bill will never become a law.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield; yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does not the gentleman think he is wasting a good deal of time over a bill that will never become a law?

Mr. FREAR. I am very much assured that the work I am doing is valuable work, and it is a public duty that I am trying to perform, even though some gentlemen may not appreciate it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is taken out of my time. This is a pretty big project, $5,400,000, and $1,000,000 contained in this bill. We all know it is a 12-foot channel. Here is a case where the office expenses and inspection in this one item, counting the balance on hand and the $1,000,000 new appropriation, reach $230,000. I think that is the amount. I have not the item right here, but it is something like that for office expenses and inspection at this particular time when surely the country is in need of every dollar that can be found. It is for a waterway that carries only an insignificant commerce; and in connection with this waterway I desire to introduce some letters in the RECORD in order to substantiate statements I have made frequently as to the additional distance and the way it will affect the people of Elizabeth City. It is intended and I presume it practically will ruin the business that is carried on down there, but I do not believe it is going to add to the value of the commerce of the South. It has decreased very materially during the past year—I think 30 per cent in the last two years. That commerce, deducting the timber and timber product, as I have it here, reaches a little over 80,000 tons.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly inform the committee as to the character and the commerce on this inland canal of 12-foot depth?

Mr. FREAR. This canal?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Beaufort Canal.

Mr. FREAR. Deducting the timber products, it reaches about 80,000 tons, as I have it; and of that, 32,000 tons are coal.

Mr. STAFFORD. Eighty thousand tons over what length of route?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, it is 200 miles, I assume. It is quite a long distance from Beaufort to Norfolk. Of that 32,000 tons of coal, the statement has been made to me, which I can not vouch for, that that coal is largely used by the Government dredges. Remember that the Government dredges are performing or are expected to perform under this appropriation about one-tenth of the work, and private contractors perform the other nine-tenths.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this entire tonnage carried throughout the length of the canal, or is some of it local?

Mr. FREAR. I could not say as to that. I know there are barges that travel the canal that carry lumber. Just how far they go I do not know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They carry lumber from North Carolina. They take it up at other points. Some of it comes from South Carolina and some from Virginia. It passes on up to Norfolk, where it is distributed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. FREAR. I want to continue. The gentleman is taking my time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought the gentleman wanted information.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, I have the information. I know the facts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman been over the canal?

Mr. FREAR. I have been down through it and lived there. Now, I can not yield to the gentleman further. These same timber products are counted at Beaufort, at Beaufort Inlet, and the same identical timber is counted as a part of the commerce at other points when it gets up here.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman state again what the commerce is on this waterway?

Mr. FREAR. In 1913 it was 258,441 tons. In 1915 it was 158,644 tons. Deducting the forest products which could travel in very low depth of water, it reached 80,788 tons. Deducting the coal—and I want to say that it is proper to carry coal, I understand that, but it may be used by the local engineers or contractors—it left a balance of about 48,000 tons. I do not pretend to claim that coal is not a proper article of commerce.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BORLAND). The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] says that the freight upon this particular canal is counted at one point and then at another and then at another, and when it crosses another canal and at some other point. Is not that same thing true of the freight on the Great Lakes with which he tries to make comparison? Is not that true in his comparisons on the first page of his report? The freight initiated at Ashland or Duluth is counted there, and when it goes through the Soo Canal it is counted, and also when it goes through the Detroit River, and when it arrives at Ashtabula or Cleveland or Buffalo it is counted again. And yet when he compares the tonnage on the Ohio River or some inland stream with that of Ashland and the other Great Lakes freight he makes no reference to the fact that that freight on the lake is counted four times.

There is another thing. In making comparisons of freight on these streams and this canal with the Ohio River, he says that the freight consists of sand, gravel, and coal and should be excluded from consideration, and yet when he compares it with the incoming tonnage at Ashland, of 700,000 tons, he did not state that over 600,000 tons are coal, and the outgoing tonnage of seven or eight million tons, practically every ton except 100,000 tons, is iron ore of a value of a little more than $2 a ton at Ashland where coal is valued at $3 a ton.

In ascertaining the tonnage of canals or that on the Ohio River, sand, gravel, and coal, he says, should be eliminated, and so he says that practically there is no tonnage on these waterways. Why does he not eliminate all the low-tonnage freight that is initiated at Ashland? If he did, he would only have a few thousand tons remaining.

I will say that some of the 600,000 tons of coal received at Ashland, Wis., in the first instance, I have no doubt is carried down the Kanawha River, 80 or 100 miles, which has been canalized. At the coal washery near my town during the high prices there is trainload after trainload of coal which has had access to other railroads than those that go into West Virginia, thereby relieving the hardships of the people. The same is true of Cincinnati, the coal comes out of the Great Kanawha and it has been taken to Cincinnati through most of the summer, and so this city has not undergone the hardship that other manufacturing centers have experienced during the recent coal shortage.

I think the gentleman should be fair, and when he asks this committee to exclude from its consideration river tonnage because the value is only $2 or $3 or $4 a ton, and makes a comparison with some lake port in his own State, he ought to eliminate all the low-priced tonnage from that port. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Last year there was a provision carried in the bill that a private contractor should not receive a price in excess of 25 per cent of the estimated cost of doing the work by Government plant. If I understand the hearings correctly, during the past year the Government has contracted for as much as 14 cents per cubic yard on this work, whereas the price paid to the private contractors before was only about 7 cents, and the price estimated to do the work by Government dredge was only about 4 cents. I have not the exact figures in my mind, but what is the reason that it is now costing twice as much to do the work as it did before we placed a limit on the amount allowable under private contract?

Mr. SMALL. I do not suppose the gentleman would wish me to consume undue time, but I have a letter here from the district engineer, to whom I wrote as to the facts in regard to that matter, which I will read into the RECORD in my time. I will say that the law has not been violated as to the difference between the contract price and the Government price. The law has been observed.

Mr. GOOD. If the letter goes into the RECORD, that will answer my question.

Mr. SMALL. Yes; but, as the gentleman will observe, the same provision is carried in the pending bill.

Mr. GOOD. Now, according to the report of the engineers, there has been appropriated for this item—I have not the figures as to what has been expended—$2,300,000, and I understand there is quite a large balance in the Treasury. I also observe that the tonnage for 1913 was 258,441 tons, while that of 1914 was 229,047 tons, and in 1915 it had fallen to 158,644 short tons. This is a remarkable showing. Here we have expended in the neighborhood of $2,000,000, with the net result that the tonnage has decreased from 258,000 to 158,000 tons, a loss of 100,000 tons, while this large expenditure has been going on.

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman wish me to reply to that now?

Mr. GOOD. No; I imagine the gentleman would want more time than I should be able to give him. But if this is a fair sample of what we are getting for our money for this kind of work, it will take more time than the gentleman has allotted to him to satisfy the people of the United States that this is a legitimate expenditure of the people's money.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy very little time in discussing the general merits of this Norfolk-Beaufort waterway. It has been discussed in Congress perhaps every year since 1902. It has been examined under authority of Congress either by individual district engineers or by special boards of engineers, and reviewed each time by the reviewing Board of Engineers and by the Chief of Engineers at least five or six times since 1902. Every report has been favorable in every respect. None of these reports contains any criticism or cast any doubts upon its merit. If gentlemen can find any paragraph in any of these reports doing so, I will be glad to yield to them for that purpose, so that, so far as the Army engineers are concerned, after repeated investigations, it is a meritorious project.

Answering several criticisms which have been made, first, as to the commerce. Gentlemen are forgetful of what occurred in this body at the last session when the last bill was under consideration. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] speaks of the tonnage as being 158,644, and deducting various products, he assumes to reduce it to 80,000. His figures and deductions are not accurate, but it is surplusage to refer to the inaccuracies of the gentleman when it comes to figures. He seems to have acquired a bad habit in that respect, but I wish to make this statement regarding the commerce on this waterway, and I ask the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. There were two privately owned canals from Elizabeth River, on which Norfolk is situated, to Albemarle Sound, N. C. One was known as the Dismal Swamp Canal, a lock canal, and the other as the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal, a tidal canal. They were substantially competitive canals, having the same general terminii. The Government, under the recommendation of engineers, purchased the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal. At the time of the purchase the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal had deteriorated and was not in as good condition for commerce as the Dismal Swamp Canal. By reason of the deteriorated condition of the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal at the time the Government purchased it in 1913, and because the work of construction of that waterway has been going on since that time. the construction work itself thereby impairing progress and impeding its navigability, it has been even less navigable than it was before the work of construction began. Therefore loaded barges, loaded steamers of every kind have of necessity been compelled to navigate the old Dismal Swamp Canal and pay tolls, because they could not navigate this Government-owned canal, the Albemarle & Chesapeake, until after it had been improved to the projected depth of 12 feet.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman does not mean to say to the committee that these two canals both commence at Norfolk and end at Beaufort?

Mr. SMALL. They do; but I was adverting to the upper section, from Norfolk to Albemarle Sound. They each commence on Elizabeth River, Va., and end in Albemarle Sound, N. C.

Mr. GOOD. One of them serves a part of the country that the other does not at all.

Mr. SMALL. That is true only in a limited sense. I am not advocating any particular canal. The engineers, for reasons submitted, recommended the purchase and adoption of the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal; and if the gentleman would read the report, which I assume he has not, he would be convinced that the conclusion of the engineers in recommending the purchase of the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal was strongly fortified. To pursue the matter further, therefore, when the Albemarle & Chesapeake or the Government Canal is improved, that will, of course, being a free waterway, invite all of the traffic; but until it is completed this waterway is entitled to be credited with the traffic which goes through both canals. For the year 1915, the last figures obtainable, the traffic through this Government-owned canal, the Albemarle & Chesapeake, was, as the gentleman says, 158,644 tons. The traffic through the Dismal Swamp Canal was 413,679 tons, making a total of 572,323 tons, a very substantial commerce. The value of the commerce through the Government-owned canal now under improvement was $4,316,000. The value of the traffic through the Dismal Swamp Canal, the toll canal, was $10,310,000, a total of $14,627,000. I explained to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] this phase of the commerce more than two times, neither of which times did he enter any criticisms to the proposition which I made, and yet, forgetting that he had ever had any knowledge of that explanation, he rises in the House to-day and seeks to impress the House—it would not be parliamentary for me to say to mislead the House, and therefore I can not say it——

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Not now. Therefore he endeavors to create the impression that all of the commerce which is to be affected by the construction of this waterway is that which is now carried on the Albemarle & Chesapeake or Government-owned free canal when he knows that the conclusion is inevitable that when the improved waterway is completed to 12 feet in depth, with adequate width, being a free canal and a tidal canal all of the commerce will go through it. So I say it is proper to give consideration to this 527,323 tons, at a valuation of nearly $15,000,000, as the commerce to be affected by this waterway.

Something was said about the large balance on hand. The statement of the gentleman as to the large balance on hand on June 30, 1916, is correct; but the gentleman will remember that our last rivers and harbors appropriation bill did not become a law until some time in July, 1916, so that the appropriation was not available then. I have the statement of the district engineer, which I shall insert in the RECORD.

Mr. GOOD. Would any serious detriment be caused to this canal if we were to drop out this appropriation for this year? We have more than a million on hand.

Mr. SMALL. I was just going to explain that there is nothing substantially on hand at this time, except what is left for contingencies. I have the statement of the district engineers to the effect that all of this money has been contracted out. As to the question of the cost of dredging, I shall not have time to read all of this letter, but I shall insert it in the RECORD. This is a letter from Col. J. P. Jervey, district engineer, located at Norfolk, Va., who, at my request, based on the criticisms in the minority report of the gentleman from Wisconsin, has answered certain questions, and he gives a full explanation showing the difference in the cost of dredging for 1916, 1915, and 1914.

That difference arises from the difference in the material to be removed, such as roots and stumps, which adds to the cost, and it is all thoroughly explained in this letter, which I will insert in the RECORD and which I wish I had time now to read to the committee. Now, criticism is made of the engineers because, as the gentleman says, out of the appropriation on hand at the end of the last fiscal year something like $100,000 was reserved, they said, for contingencies, surveys, inspections, and so forth, and because a substantial amount was reserved for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, therefore waste of money or some other maladministration in the expenditure of this fund is of necessity attributable to the engineers. With reference to that, I would like to read this paragraph from the letter of Col. Jervey:

With respect to the item of $100,000 for supervision, given on page 525 of the annual report for 1916, I would state that it is not an unusual custom in all engineering work to add an item of 10 per cent for engineering expenses, supervision, and contingencies. In this office, in the past two years, there has been very little work other than that pertaining to the inland waterway. As a result, the greater proportion of the office expenses and drafting-room expenses in the Norfolk offices have been paid from the appropriation for the inland waterway. In addition, several survey parties are maintained, two houseboats, two inspectors on each contract dredge, launches, inspection boats, care of plant, and extraordinary repairs are paid for under this heading. Engineering, like every other profession, can not be made an absolutely exact science, and unforeseen contingencies always occur, which must be provided for under a blanket estimate. Considering, therefore, the specific items which I have indicated, and the fact that unforeseen contingencies are also provided for, the estimate of $100,000, or 10 per cent of the total, is a customary and reasonable one.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including the whole of this letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

JANUARY 22, 1917.

From: The district engineer, Norfolk, Va.
To: Hon. JOHN H. SMALL, M. C., House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Improvement of inland waterway, Norfolk to Beaufort.

1. I have your letter of the 20th instant, and in response to your request the following data is furnished you, covering cost of dredging in the inland waterway from Norfolk, Va., to Beaufort Inlet, N. C., for 1914 and 1915 (printed in Annual Reports for 1915 and 1916, respectively).

2. As shown in the Annual Report for 1915, page 486, the average cost of the work for the year with Government plant was 0.043 cent per cubic yard, place measurement, and the average contract price was 0.075 cent per cubic yard, place measurement. By referring to page 2324 of the same report it will be seen that about 74 per cent of the contract work was in Currituck Sound and lower North Landing River, where the material was almost pure sand, containing no stumps, and about 26 per cent in Coinjock Bay and North Carolina Cut, where a large proportion of stumps and logs were encountered. Where the contractor dredged in sand, dikes were constructed to keep the sand from being brought back into the channel in the exposed portions of Currituck Sound and Coinjock Bay, thus adding to the cost. For the Government dredge, in the same year, about 90 per cent was in sand, where no dikes were required. It may be noted that the contract dredging in Coinjock Bay and the North Carolina Cut for the year was 0.948 cent per cubic yard, place measurement, whereas the cost of the Government dredging in the Virginia Cut was 0.1399 cent per cubic yard, place measurement. The cost of the contract dredging in lower North Landing River was over twice the cost of the Government dredging in the same locality, but the Government dredge at the time was new and the cost of repairs nominal. During the present year the cost of repairs to the Government dredge has been very high, and the cost of the Government dredging for the year will therefore be increased.

3. On page 523 of the report for 1916 the average cost of the Government dredging for the year is shown as 0.1117 cent per cubic yard, place measurement; the average contract price is 0.1118 cent per cubic yard, place measurement. By referring to page 2175 of the same report it will be seen that over one-half of the contract dredging was in Coinjock Bay, North Carolina Cut, and the Virginia Cut. In the Virginia Cut the roots and logs encountered were excessive in number, and added greatly to the expense. For the Government dredging, about 75 per cent was in the Virginia Cut. It will be noted that the cost of the contract dredging in Virginia Cut for this year was 14 cents per cubic yard, place measurement; the cost of the Government dredging was 12 cents per cubic yard, place measurement. In lower North Landing River the cost of the contract dredging was 0.059 cent per cubic yard, place measurement, and the cost of the Government dredging 0.074 cent per cubic yard, place measurement. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, considerable repair work was necessary on the Government dredge, and this, together with more difficult work, fully accounts for increased cost.

4. The contract for the present year is for 14¾ cents per cubic yard, place measurement, and this contract covers work in the Virginia Cut, in upper North Landing River, on the North River Bar, and in upper North River. These sections are all difficult, either on account of roots and stumps or on account of exposure. In addition, there are comparatively easy sections in lower North Landing River and lower North River. Since last year coal, which probably in the past amounted to 25 per cent of the expense of operating the dredges, has more than doubled in price. Wages have also been largely increased, both for the supervisory force and for the mechanical and laboring force. We have made careful comparisons, based on actual figures, of the estimated cost by the Government plant and by contract, of the work to be done this year, and I am satisfied that the bid of 14¾ cents per cubic yard, place measurement, is a fair average, and is not more than 25 per cent in excess of what the cost, under present conditions, would have been to the Government, using its own plant. These estimates were prepared in great detail and submitted to the Chief of Engineers with the abstract of bids. Considering these facts, I am satisfied that the criticisms contained in the minority report on the river and harbor bill as to the contract prices and prices of work done by Government plant on the inland waterway are unwarranted.

5. With respect to the item of $100,000 for supervision, given on page 525 of the annual report for 1916, I would state that it is not an unusual custom in all engineering work to add an item of 10 per cent for engineering expenses, supervision, and contingencies. In this office, in the past two years, there has been very little work other than that pertaining to the inland waterway. As a result, the greater proportion of the office expenses and drafting-room expenses in the Norfolk office have been paid for from the appropriation for the inland waterway. In addition, several survey parties are maintained, two house boats, two inspectors on each contract dredge, launches, inspection boats, care of plant, and extraordinary repairs are paid for under this heading. Engineering, like every other profession, can not be made an absolutely exact science, and unforeseen contingencies always occur, which must be provided for under a blanket estimate. Considering, therefore, the specific items which I have indicated, and the fact that unforeseen contingencies are also provided for, the estimate of $100,000, or 10 per cent of the total, is a customary and reasonable one.

6. With reference to your request for information as to the difference in distance between Elizabeth City, N. C., and Norfolk, Va., via the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal route and via the Dismal Swamp Canal route, I have to state that careful measurements, made from large scale maps in this office, show that the distance from Elizabeth City, N. C., to Norfolk, Va., via the Albemarle & Chesapeake Canal route is 89.4 statute miles, and via the Dismal Swamp Canal route 51.7 statute miles. This information was furnished as part of my recent testimony before the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

7. I would be glad if you would communicate with the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, before using this letter in connection with the debate on the bill. I am sending a copy of this letter to the Chief of Engineers to-day.

J. P. JERVEY,
Lieutenant Colonel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Manteo Bay, N. C.: For maintenance, $500; completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 864, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $28,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement; in all, $28,500.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph; that is, all referring to the new project. It is at the top of page 13, leaving in the item for maintenance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, strike out all of lines 2 to 7, inclusive.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is what is known, I take it, as the Shallowbag Bay, Manteo Island. I have been on this project—that is, I have gone there in a canoe years ago—and I know what it is. This project has already had $18,750, which is a small appropriation; $4,791 is the balance on hand, according to the statement, and $5,000 is asked for maintenance, which, of course, is reasonable. The project has been completed, and the balance of the funds are to be used, as stated by the engineer's report, for dredging and for superintendence, and so forth. The total commerce is about 12,000 tons, and a large portion of that is ice. Under this new project, which is contained in Document No. 864, I will just read briefly two or three matters that occur there:

If the commerce on this inland route ever amounts to anything, this bay, which is the only landlocked harbor on the route through the sounds, will certainly increase in importance.

We do not know it is going to amount to anything, and that is rather anticipating the future. On page 9, it says:

Existing terminal and transfer facilities are considered adequate to meet the needs of present commerce. It is probable that the construction of private terminals will keep abreast of the needs of commerce as it may develop.

On page 11 it says:

The proposed extension of the upper limits of the town of Manteo can not be regarded as entirely free from a local or terminal improvement character. Under the existing project, however, a channel was dredged up Doughs Creek in front of the wharves to nearly, if not quite, the limit of the basin, as shown on the drawing. If no basin for turning were provided, the approach channel improvement could not be of great advantage. If the turning basin constructed just at the head of the approach channel, the East Carolina Transportation Co. would be the direct beneficiary of the improvements and all other interests might be damaged, as competition might be eliminated. Although to some extent local in character, the dredging of the basin, both up Doughs Creek and toward the marine railway, would undoubtedly give a great impetus to the general commerce of Manteo.

In the hearing the Member of Congress was there in a representative capacity, and special stress was laid upon the inadequacy of the present proper depth on account of the depression of the water surface at tide. All I care to say in regard to this is that I am somewhat familiar with the proposition, although I have not been over this for years. We have made some improvements, and there is no evidence that necessitates this project being put in at this time. In order to save a little money to the Treasury with which to meet conditions which now confront us, I have moved to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this paragraph ought to be stricken out. I am very sorry to take issue with my friend from Wisconsin. If he had not called attention to the fact I would not have known this item related to Shallowbag Bay, because the item read "Manteo Bay, N. C." I am delighted, however, that the gentleman from Wisconsin has once sailed the waters of Shallowbag Bay——

Mr. FREAR. In a canoe.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He tells me he did that in a canoe many years ago. They used to sail on the Tombigbee River, but I question whether many of them would risk it on Shallowbag Bay. Shallowbag Bay is a very wide stretch of water and canoes might not navigate it with entire safety. Now, I do not know when the gentleman from Wisconsin was at Shallowbag Bay. It must have been in the days of his youth, which, of course, was not very long ago.

But I traveled over Shallowbag Bay several years ago in an effort to reach the island of Manteo, and it was one of the most interesting and instructive trips of my life, because on the island of Manteo I was able to visit the little five-pronged fort, which was the scene of the celebrated lost colony. It was within the circle of this fort that the first white child was born in what is now the United States. Virginia Dare was born on the island of Manteo, in the little old fortification, remnants of which still remain.

Now, the gentleman opposes an appropriation to reach through from the mainland of North Carolina to Roanoke Island, where the first English settlement was made, and where Sir Walter Raleigh's colonists first landed; and the gentleman objects, because in his youth he sailed gaily over the waters of Shallowbag Bay in a frail canoe. I have met the people of Manteo, and I have observed that they have very scant communication with the mainland; that they transact their business there within the narrow confines of Roanoke Island the best they can, and that there are still some people upon the island of Manteo who have never seen the mainland and who have never had the opportunity to ride upon the railroad train or to get out of the way of a trolley car. And the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] will deny these people the right to visit the great world beyond the island of Manteo and fraternize a little bit with the common citizenship of this land, for the mere pittance of a paltry appropriation intended to widen the channel by which vessels of commerce and those carrying passengers can travel back and forth from the island of Manteo and the mainland.

Now, this is protected water, in a sense; and it is water in which the oyster grows quite prolifically. It is an opportunity that the Government has to say to one set of its people, remote from the centers of civilization, that they can get out of the narrow confines in which they have been circumscribed from the beginning of their career and see something of the world. Business is done on the island of Manteo. Communication is had in a scant way with the mainland. The vessels that go back and forth are of a very shallow type, of a very limited capacity, and why should we not say to the people who are there that with the expenditure of this small amount of money we will open up the channel through Shallowbag Bay and let them get steamers in there so that they can run back and forth from the mainland.

Mr. SMALL. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to say that this bay is located at Roanoke Island, of course entirely surrounded by water. The bay leads up to Manteo, the county seat, a county whose population is entirely engaged in fishing. The town has a population of about 2,000, and they have no means of transportation except by water. I know personally that the statements in the report of the Army Engineers as to the necessity for a deeper channel are true.

Mr. FREAR. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania gave ample reason for this appropriation when he said, or practically said, that this would result in making this channel a sort of monument to the first white child born in the United States?

Mr. SMALL. I think that was ample, and I only rose in order that my silence might not be misinterpreted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Thoroughfare Bay, N. C.: Completing improvement of channel connecting Thoroughfare Bay and Cedar Bay, N. C., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1125, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $5,200.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, strike out all of lines 8 to 12, inclusive.

Mr. FREAR. I realize, Mr. Chairman, that this is another monument that may be erected, and, of course, with that conclusion and that construction it will be entitled to be passed upon favorably by the House, and yet there are some things to be said. There is no white child born here for the first time in America, surely. They can not have that honor. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is so prolific in explanation it is hard to meet him on that ground, and I can not anticipate what he has here. But what the report says, in House Document No. 1125, is as follows:

At the west end of Thoroughfare Bay there is a ditch averaging about 200 feet wide and 5 feet deep, which extends for a distance of about 1½ miles through the marsh to the head of Cedar Bay and bears evidence of having been cut through by hand at some remote date. Local tradition has it that this work was done by the Indians. Cedar Bay opens on the south side of Neuse River. Its mouth is 39 miles easterly from Newbern and 53 miles southerly from Washington, N. C. * * * There is some navigation through this waterway at present, it being used, whenever the tide is high enough to permit of passage, by boats plying between Newbern or Washington and Core Sound points, and by vessels engaged in oystering. The commerce thus carried is necessarily small, due to the conditions of draft at either end.

In other words, it is the second waterway that has been there. It says on top of page 6:

It is not believed that any great permanent increase of the commerce in oysters will result from the proposed improvement, as conservation of the oyster beds is not practiced. There is however, a strong probability that the improvement would hasten the agricultural development, and a greatly increased commerce should result from this source.

It is a small project, and I realize that the gentleman who represented the district was before the board, and with commendable energy he presented the matter, I assume, and it was again put in the Engineer's report and favorably approved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one thought occurs to me that I almost forgot. A few moments ago when we were discussing the Beaufort Canal, it was suggested that on a little harbor up in my State I omitted to refer to coal and other traffic carried there, but did mention it when it was on some of these rivers and inland waters. That was not because it is not a valuable product anywhere. That was not the thought at all. Where coal is carried from Ashland and from the Duluth-Superior region they require large depths, and I think 600 miles would be the average length of haul.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on the Mississippi or the Ohio, or whatever river it may be, there was more coal carried 30 years ago than there is to-day. That is what I had reference to. It requires a far deeper draft in these large harbors, but the coal has been carried for years and scores of years down the Allegheny, down the Ohio, and down the Mississippi; and the statement was made that it does not require an increased draft for that kind of commerce. It is not but that it is just as valuable. The same is true as to timber products. You do not need it on the Tennessee more than 30 years ago. That was the reason it was deducted in the statement which was made. The reason was not because it was not valuable, but the statement is made that a draft of 14 or 20 feet is needed on the Lakes for carrying these large cargoes, whereas less than half that draft by far is the average on the rivers.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto end in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto end in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HOOD].

Mr. HOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the rivers and harbors bill. I firmly believe that the improvement of our rivers and harbors is essential to the welfare of the people of this country.

I believe that the expenditure providing for continued work on the inland waterway between Norfolk and Beaufort is wise and proper. I know that when this link is completed it will be a godsend to coastwise travel, thereby obviating the necessity of traveling around Hatteras.

I hope the day is not far distant when liberal appropriations will be made to complete the link of the inland waterway between Beaufort, Cape Fear, and other northern and southern points.

I represent the people along the coast practically all the way between Beaufort and Cape Fear, and I know they are anxious for the completion of this link, as they realize the great benefits to be derived from it.

In addition to the various appropriations made for the maintenance of the rivers and harbors in my district and the continuance of existing projects, I have two new projects which are worthy and meritorious. I earnestly hope that these projects will be approved by the Members of the House. There is an item in this bill for $15,900 for the improvement of Beaufort Harbor.

The necessity for an anchorage basin in Beaufort Harbor is imperative because of the constantly increasing number of boats operating from this point and the congestion of the harbor, where these boats are compelled to anchor in the narrow channel running parallel with the water front of the town. There is no sheltered locality provided by nature in the vicinity and to prevent the boats from catching aground on ebb tide, and for shelter from storms anchorage is made in the narrow channel, which, with a southerly wind, barely affords swinging room by the piers. It is a very difficult matter at times to reach the piers for this reason. Quite a number of these vessels are engaged in the menhaden industry, and they invariably go out of the harbor between 3 and 4 o'clock a. m., and about 50 per cent of the time come into harbor after dark. The proposed anchorage basin for which this bill provides will be located at the nearest approach to the harbor, and will accommodate not only the boats operating regularly to and from Beaufort, but will afford a sheltered anchorage basin for the great number of yachts making their trips from northern points to Florida.

There is another item appropriating the sum of $5,200 for the improvement of Thoroughfare Bay to the extent of providing a channel 5 feet deep and 50 feet wide connecting Core Sound and Pamlico Sound near the mouth of Neuse River.

Maj. H. W. Stickles, the district engineer at that time, in his report of preliminary examinations, says:

The northerly winds during the oyster season frequently render passage from Pamlico Sound to Core Sound via Harbor Island Bar exceedingly rough and dangerous, and it is a frequent occurrence for these oystermen to have to make a harbor and wait for two or three days before they can make the passage.

These oystermen are largely dredgers, using boats from 250 to 800 bushels capacity, drawing from 3 to 5 feet when loaded. Their main dredging ground is around the mouth of Neuse River, and by the deepening of the proposed channel to a depth of 5 feet would save some 25 miles of travel to reach the market for their oysters.

This improvement would undoubtedly save the vessels about one-third of their time in going to Washington, Newbern, and other points which are the largest markets in that section. In considering the extra miles of travel, with the present entrance to Core Sound via Harbor Island Bar, due consideration should be given the fact that this bar has filled up until it is dangerous for boats drawing as much as 5 feet of water, and one-half of the extra distance to be traveled to reach Core Sound, to wit, the distance from the northern entrance to Thoroughfare Bay to Harbor Island Bar, is over the roughest body of inland water in the State.

A report has reached me in the last few days of the serious damage to a schooner laden with oysters on the Harbor Island Bar, and I am informed that it is not an unusual occurrence for vessels to be stranded at that point.

Total receipts:

Oysters in shell	bushels	368,000
Merchandise		$131,661
Coal	tons	300
Lumber	feet	35,000
Wire fencing	coils	100
Fertilizer	tons	175
Wood	cords	1,275
Fresh fish	pounds	1,211,250

The people of this section are largely engaged in gathering water products, and the tonnage passing through this waterway would more than justify the small expenditure asked for.

I believe that hundreds of thousands of bushels of oysters and hundreds of thousands of pounds of fresh fish will be transported annually through this waterway, together with a very large percentage of merchandise, for points in Core Sound which have no railroad facilities.

I know that this proposed improvement will be a wonderful benefit to several thousand of as good, loyal, intelligent citizens of Carteret and Pamlico Counties as will be found anywhere in this country. I respectfully urge the Members of the House to vote favorably upon these projects. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I want a few minutes in which to make a reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. The gentleman suggests that you do not need deep water to carry coal on the Ohio River as they do on the Great Lakes. I do not know how he reaches that conclusion. If he had read the report that was made when the Ohio River project was adopted in 1910, and had read the letter written by Col. Sibert, he certainly would come to a different conclusion. I desire to read the statement of Capt. William L. Sibert. In that letter he says:

It is estimated that the cost of carrying 3,500,000 tons of coal from Pittsburgh to Louisville in the present state of the Ohio is 45.8 cents per ton, and that if the river were permanently deepened to 9 feet the cost would be only 24.1 cents per ton.

That was before the adoption of this canalization project.

He further estimated that with the improved river the rate per ton from Louisville to New Orleans would be only 53.38 cents, as against 89.2 cents at that time. The saving would thus be 21.7 cents per ton from Pittsburgh to Louisville, and 35.82 cents more from Louisville to New Orleans.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not all. It is true that coal was floated upon the Ohio River before the building of any locks and dams, and before any of those things were constructed. But recollect that that was only during the high-water periods of the river. These great coal barges carry from 500 to 1,000 tons of coal at 6, 7, 8, or 9 feet of water, just the same as they do on the Great Lakes; that is, if you want to get a very low rate of carriage.

But that is not all. Since the canalization of the Great Kanawa River and the Monongahela River coal is brought down in the low-water period of those streams, such as we had last summer, as I stated a while ago, and taken to the great Northwest at a time when the people actually needed the coal, whereas it would probably have lain along the banks of the stream until fall or next winter, or next spring maybe, at a time when the people would not be in such great need of fuel. It is this certainty of having access to this coal by this great permanent waterway channel from Pittsburgh to Cairo and out of these tributaries that is at least of the greatest advantage to such places as Louisville, Portsmouth, Cincinnati, and Huntington, W. Va. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cape Lookout harbor of refuge, N. C.: Continuing improvement, $425,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, is it in order just now to ask unanimous consent to close debate?

Mr. FREAR. After I have made my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. After there has been some debate on the paragraph it will be in order.

Mr. FREAR. I desire to talk on the paragraph.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I did not want to cut the gentleman out of his time.

Mr. FREAR. I just wanted to make a statement in regard to the project; that is all. I do not care to reply to my friend from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER], who seems to be anticipating that there will be some criticism of the Ohio River. He has vigorously defended it, and I do believe that will be necessary to justify the large appropriation it receives.

On this Cape Lookout harbor of refuge proposition a peculiar state of affairs is presented. We appropriated $1,426,000, and have $96,000 on hand; and this is a proposal to appropriate $425,000, although the Army engineers, as I understand, ask for $850,000 at this time. The expenditures in 1916 included $13,776 for office expenses.

But this is the part that I desire to present more particularly: This is a harbor project in which the Army engineers refused, as I understand, to make a recommendation. I ask to be corrected if I am mistaken. That is, they rejected it, in other words, until finally a report was presented.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wish to say that the Army engineers recommended that project. Otherwise we would not have adopted it.

Mr. FREAR. I am not criticizing the action of the committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The only engineer who reported against it, as I recall, was Gen., then Col., Kingman, who thought that a harbor of refuge in that vicinity should be constructed, if at all, at another place.

Mr. FREAR. This is the situation, as I understand the record: Gen. Kingman, who was the recent Chief of Engineers, as an underofficer, opposed the construction of a harbor of refuge at either Cape Lookout or Hatteras. I so understood. But Congress directed a report as to which was the more desirable—a harbor at either Lookout or at Hatteras—and it was finally determined, so that there was no chance of refusal on his part, and then he decided to place it at Lookout, at a cost of $1,426,000. Is that right, Mr. Chairman, that Gen. Kingman opposed a harbor at either place, but eventually Congress directed him to report at which of the two points—Point Lookout or Hatteras—was the more desirable, and Congress overruled his objection, and then he reported favorably to Lookout?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Gen. Kingman thought that Cape Hatteras was preferable to Cape Lookout for a harbor of refuge, if one was located at either place.

Mr. FREAR. But he was opposed to either, as I understand it.

I do not move to strike it out, because I realize that we are committed to the project. I refer to this to show the policy pursued by Congress. This engineer seeks as best he may to oppose and prevent what he believes to be an unnecessary project. Then Congress directs him to go on with the $3,500,000 project which we are now completing.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beaufort Harbor, N. C.: For maintenance, $4,500; completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1108, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $15,900; in all, $20,400.

Mr. FREAR. I move to strike out all after the figures "$4,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FREAR: Page 14, line 16, following the figures "$4,500," in line 16, strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. This is a new project. We have appropriated on this harbor $112,000, have $10,037 on hand, and $14,000 is proposed as maintenance, although that has been cut in the bill.

I wish to read from House Document No. 1108, Sixty-third Congress, second session, a very interesting statement by Gen. Kingman, which was made May 1, 1913, in regard to this project. This is for the new project. He says:

1. I am of the opinion that this project is not worthy of a survey. I do not believe in the policy of attempting to provide an anchorage basin sufficient to accommodate all the vessels which may go to a harbor of this kind; such a thing would be entirely impossible, not even thought of in connection with most of our harbors which do fifty or one hundred times as much business as this one does. It seems to me to be foolish to attempt to excavate and maintain a basin which the district officer thinks must be more than a half mile long and 500 feet wide to accommodate 25 little vessels having an average length of less than 65 feet each. I don't see any necessity of these vessels anchoring right in front of the town. They should go to the wharves to receive and deliver freight, and afterwards, if they want to anchor, they should go to whatever sheltered locality nature provides in the vicinity.

2. I do not recommend the expenditure of any money for a survey or preparation of any plan for a larger turning basin or an extensive anchorage ground.

After that, on page 3, it shows that two representatives appeared before the Board of Army Engineers, and on page 2 occurs this very remarkable statement from the same gentleman who before had recommended against it, but who subsequently approved it. He says:

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports, I concur with the views of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and therefor report that the improvement by the United States of Beaufort Harbor, N. C., with a view to providing a suitable turning basin and anchorage area in front of the town of Beaufort, is deemed advisable to the extent of excavating to a depth of 10 feet at mean low water the triangular area shown in solid lines on the accompanying map, at an estimated cost of $15,900 for first construction and $1,100 annually for maintenance. The full amount of the estimate should be provided in one appropriation.

Here is a situation where the officer, first as a division officer, reports against it, and subsequently reports in favor of it after a hearing has been had.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Scuppernong River, N. C.: For maintenance, $3,500; completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1196, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $31,800; in all, $35,300.

Mr. FREAR. I move to strike out all of the paragraph following the figures "$3,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, strike out the paragraph beginning with the word "completing," in line 2, and ending with line 5.

Mr. FREAR. On the old project we have spent $34,900, and have a small balance on hand of $1,408, which calls for $3,500 for maintenance. The proposed amendment does not strike that out.

The project was completed in 1909. There is a small commerce upon it, but I wish to read from this proposal for the new project. Reading on page 5 of House Document No. 1196, Sixty-second Congress, third session, it says:

The improvements made to date have resulted in placing the commerce upon a substantial basis, except for a severe blow received in 1908.

Mr. Chairman, here is a situation that arises quite frequently, and I call the attention of the House to it:

Prior to that time there were no railroads in this section, and all transportation of products to market at Edenton, Elizabeth City, and Norfolk was dependent entirely upon water. During 1908, a branch of the Norfolk Southern Railroad was extended to Creswell and Columbia, along the west shore of the river, connecting with the main line of this road near Mackeys Ferry on Albemarle Sound. This, combined with the financial panic of that year, resulted in a great decrease in river commerce, the tonnage falling from 68,630 in 1907 to 12,515 in 1908.

The following year it rose again.

Generally speaking the depth of water appears to be ample for the 1 steamer and 25 schooners that navigate this river, but they dislike to go above Cross Landing on account of the great difficulty they have in navigating this portion of the river.

On page 6, it says:

There are eight wharves at Columbia, all owned by private parties. The Norfolk Southern Railroad Co. has a wharf with rail connections here, where freight may be transferred from rail to water, and vice versa. There are eight landings between Columbia and Spruills Bridge. There are two wharves at the latter place, owned by private parties, which are open to the public at the rate of $3 per day.

Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me that sufficient necessity has been shown in the case of this new project to require its insertion in the bill, and I move to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Northeast, Black, and Cape Fear Rivers, N. C.: For maintenance of Northeast and Black Rivers and of Cape Fear River above Wilmington, $5,000; completing improvement of Northeast River, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1356, Sixty-second Congress, third session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $25,375; in all, $30,375.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of lines 17 to 21, inclusive. That leaves the item for maintenance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 14, by striking out all of the paragraph beginning with line 17 and ending with line 21.

Mr. FREAR. In regard to this project we have expended so far $43,000. This carries $30,375. Now, House Document No. 1356 says that the total tonnage for this stream is given as 150,019 for the calendar year ending December 31, 1911, valued at approximately $1,800,000, of which about 42,000 tons, valued at about $770,000, is credited to that portion of the lower river where improvement is desired. Owing to the recent completion of a third fertilizer factory it is expected that the commerce for 1912 will be considerably larger.

The improvement proposed extends about 2¾ miles above the mouth of the river, about 1½ miles above the present deep-water project in front of the city of Wilmington.

On page 14 it says:

If the improvement is worthy of being made at all, it is worthy of being made in the way that I have described. If we spend $50,000 in making a 150-foot channel, it is my prediction that we will spend $50,000 more in the next 10 or 12 years in keeping it open, and we will have an unsatisfactory channel most of the time.

He says that a personal inspection of the plants located on the banks of this portion of the river has been made by the present district officer, a thorough examination being made of two of the fertilizer plants and all the details of their operation. The parties interested were communicated with as to cooperation, and a letter from this office and reply, dated August 29, 1912, are attached thereto.

This seems to be a proposition in favor of a fertilizer factory, and I submit there is no excuse for the Government spending money for that purpose.

Now, referring to the Army Engineer's report, it appears that they have by the use of money appropriated by Congress attained an additional depth at the Highway Bridge of one-tenth of a foot—that is 1 inch—and below that point is an additional depth of half a foot.

It seems to me that as long as this is near the mouth of the river and of benefit to a fertilizer factory alone, there ought to be a contribution.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this the Neubegen River?

Mr. FREAR. This is the Northeast River.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman a question. He is advancing new ideas here all the time.

Mr. FREAR. I want to state to the gentleman that this is an unusual proposition for a private concern, as I read the report.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman is stating ideas to the House, some of which I think are worthy of discussion. The gentleman objects to the improvement of the stream up to the fertilizer factory. This is a section of the country where they use fertilizers.

Mr. FREAR. You might just as well put in a sidetrack from a railroad as to dig a trench from this river up to that factory.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Several years ago I had an inquiry made as to the cost of transporting fertilizers from a city like Philadelphia or Baltimore to Wilmington, N. C., and I found that to send it over the rails it would cost about $4.80 for a short ton of 2,000 pounds, while to send it over the inside waterways would cost $1.80 per ton of 2,240 pounds. It did seem to me that there ought to be some relief for the farmers of the South who desire to obtain fertilizers from the northern factories. The gentleman from Wisconsin has several times discussed the question of economy and saving money by not passing the river and harbor bill. I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks we are saving any money by refusing to pass this bill when we have appropriated $20,000,000 for the erection of a nitrate plant which may involve——

Mr. FREAR. I may agree that both are extravagant, but let me ask the gentleman, does he believe it is a proper thing for the Government to dredge a ditch or channel up to an individual fertilizer factory?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think if the enterprise is established, the plant is constructed, the men are employed who must go back and forth, and if the fertilizer factory is removed far enough so as not to interfere with the resident portion, that we ought to afford them means to get back and forth. If the gentleman has ever lived near a fertilizer factory he will understand the conditions. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. If this be the policy of the Government to furnish this facility to a factory, it is a different policy from what is generally understood, because this is for an individual institution. It is not for the general public. We might just as well, Mr. Chairman, say that the Government should build a sidetrack up to this particular fertilizer factory for a mile and a half as to say that it should dig a channel. It does not seem a proper use of public money.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask some member of this committee a question, and I do not care who gives me the information. This is a proposition to improve the Northeast River in North Carolina in accordance with the recommendations in House Document No. 1356, Sixty-second Congress, and so forth. I hold in my hand the report of the River and Harbor Committee. I am not interested in the discussion as to the advisability or nonadvisability of this proposition, but on page 14 of this document it says:

After careful consideration the board reports that in its opinion the conditions, present and prospective, justify the Federal Government in participating in this improvement under proper conditions of cooperation, and that it is advisable for the United States to undertake the construction of a channel 150 feet wide and 22 feet deep, as proposed by the district officer, at an estimated cost of $50,750 and an annual maintenance charge of $3,000, provided local or other interests will contribute one-half the estimated cost, $25,375, of first construction.

What I want to know is whether this bill provides for that local contribution?

Mr. SMALL. No part of this appropriation will be available or expended until the local interests have contributed an equal amount, and that sum has been deposited with the treasurer.

Mr. COX. What is the plan of the War Department; what do they require before the work begins as to the raising of the money?

Mr. SMALL. The War Department does not attempt to control the manner in which the money shall be raised.

Mr. COX. No; but the War Department does not begin its work until an equal amount has been furnished by the people—by the local interests.

Mr. SMALL. Not until the local interests have raised that amount of money and placed it in the bank.

Mr. COX. The proposition is based on this report, and it carries with it the local aid as recommended by the committee?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. COX. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, just a word. I think it fair to say that no one can read the report upon which this item is based without being convinced of its merit. While it refers to several rivers, as a matter of fact, the improvement embraces only about a mile and a half of the Northeast River. For a mile and a quarter from the mouth of the Northeast River, the Northeast River emptying into the Cape Fear River, it is included in the general project of the Cape Fear River, at and below Wilmington. This project begins at a point one mile and a quarter above the mouth and extends therefrom a mile and a half above. There are large fertilizer plants located on this stretch of river. It is an anomalous proposition that industries located along a river should constitute an objection against the improvement of that river. It has been supposed that industries along the river which increase the commerce of the river offered an additional reason for its improvement, but as the engineers find that these industrial units will be benefited by the appropriation, they recommend that the Congress shall only appropriate for half and that such half shall only be available when local interests contribute the other half. It is a proposition which is worthy, and ought to be approved.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Newbegun Creek, N. C.: Completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 24, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $5,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, amend by striking out lines 22 to 25, inclusive.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the only reason for this is that this is another of those new projects which, it seems to me, ought very well to be left out of the bill. I read from House Document 24, page 5, Sixty-third Congress, first session:

12. It has not been possible to obtain complete statistics as to the annual commerce of the stream, owing to the partial destruction by fire of the records of the gasoline boat, but from the data that could be obtained it is estimated that the annual commerce amounts to about 5,000 tons, valued at $300,000.

That is to say, the gasoline boat was burned, and that destroyed all the evidence they had of commerce. To continue:

13. This is the first examination of this creek that has been directed by Congress, and no work has ever been done upon it by the United States, but about 30 years ago an attempt to improve the bar was made by a local steamboat company, which excavated the southern channel now used.

14. The work desired by the community is the provision of a narrow channel available for boats having a maximum draft of about 4½ feet. This would require a channel of about 5 feet deep inside of the creek proper, while to allow for wave action the depth over the bar should be not less than 6 feet.

15. The creek is fairly free from logs, snags, or similar obstructions, those that exist being of but little importance to navigation. In connection with other improvement, however, there are a few snags which it would be well to remove.

16. On account of the extremely small amount of sediment in the creek and the absence of caving banks and consequent snags it is believed that the cost of maintenance of the improvement should be almost negligible within the creek. Even over the bar the maintenance of a channel would not be very difficult, judging from the condition of the small channel dredged 30 years ago and still plainly apparent.

17. The total amount of work suggested above is small, and the cost would probably not be great, but what this cost will be can only be determined by a survey.

It seems to me that a matter of this kind is not of sufficient importance to be placed in the bill at this time. It carries $5,000, and while it is a small item to object to, yet we spent an hour, as I remember, before this bill was taken up in determining whether or not we would allow $300 to the Military Committee to have its hearings indexed, so that it does not seem to me that I am taking up too much time in presenting to the House the item in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Winyah Bay, S. C.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $150,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a statement in regard to both these projects. The first is in reference to the Cape Fear River. That is a project with considerable commerce. We have expended $6,281,168 upon that. There are now on hand $152,524 according to the Engineer's report. One hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars is the amount asked for and allowed in this bill. It has quite a large commerce, but a very large amount of money has been appropriated for that stream.

Coming down to the other project, Winyah Bay, we have made appropriations of $3,232,991, and have on hand a balance of $107,374. The appropriation here is $150,000. The commerce is 183,746 tons, and of that timber products amount to 156,300 tons. That leaves an actual commerce, deducting the timber products of only 27,446 tons. The statement in the Engineer's report further says that the freight rates on lumber and crossties advanced 20 per cent during the year upon this waterway. Notwithstanding the fact that the Government has put all of this money into the waterway, the freight rates on lumber and crossties has advanced. In other words, the Government has no way of determining the water rates. It can not exercise any influence, although it puts $3,000,000 into the proposition, or in the case of the Cape Fear proposition $6,000,000. We have no authority to say these rates should be controlled. I am speaking of this because it relates directly to a proposition which I proposed in a bill for a waterway commission, in which that commission is given authority to control waterway rates. It does not seem right that the carrier should have unlimited leeway in fixing rates after the Government has gone on and put money into the stream and improved it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. How much in the way of lumber did the gentleman say went down that stream?

Mr. FREAR. I said timber products and the commerce amounted to 183,746 tons.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I understood the gentleman to say that the actual commerce was not so very much. Is not lumber actual commerce?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes; but it usually can be barged in light-draft boats. Here are $3,000,000 that we have put into this waterway.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is actual commerce.

Mr. FREAR. Surely; and so are logs. Take the stream that runs through my home town. At one time when the lumber trade furnished a great deal of the commerce of the Northwest that stream was a very important stream and carried a commerce greater than the Mississippi River. At that time raft after raft of logs and lumber was carried down every day from many mills upon the river. What was known all over the great Northwest as the great lumber industry was still in existence, but to-day there is nothing; the last raft went down two years ago, and nothing is there to-day. I am speaking of that because it is only a temporary commerce and it does not require deep-draft boats.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does not that section of the country in which the gentleman lives have some other resources which would keep up the commerce of his town?

Mr. FREAR. There is practically no commerce there. It has a river a mile wide, which floats the largest boats on the Mississippi River. We have got a channel right up to the town. There are probably a dozen towns altogether, one of which has a population of 10,000, and there is practically no commerce.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the population of the town indicate anything as to the condition of the commerce?

Mr. FREAR. No. We have no use for the waterway, except for the purposes of excursions.

Mr. SPARKMAN. What I wanted to inquire was whether the population is growing?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; it is growing. It was urged differently yesterday, or a day or two ago, to which I did not care to reply, but this town contains about 4,000 inhabitants, and across a little stream of a few feet in width is another part of the town that employs some 500 men in the shops.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In that country, does not the gentleman regard lumber as commerce?

Mr. FREAR. It is temporary commerce; that is all.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, it is temporary in a sense almost everywhere.

Mr. FREAR. The Mississippi River does not float a raft to-day.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is less temporary in a State like Florida, for instance, because the timber is growing all the time the year round, and it reproduces more than in more northerly States. But usually in any section of the country there are other activities, other resources, which should develop the commerce, even when the timber is exhausted.

Mr. FREAR. Let me say this in reply to that commerce. One hundred and eighty-three thousand seven hundred and forty-six tons of commerce, of which timber products were 156,300 tons; that leaves 27,446 tons, of course, of other commerce which can be carried on this waterway on very small or shallow boats, as it does not require deep-draft boats. But does not the chairman think that $3,312,000 deserves a larger commerce than 27,000 tons? One more question which I think is a far more important one than that. Here the Army engineers say the freight rates on lumber and crossties advanced 20 per cent during the year. Now, ought not there to be some way by which the Government, after improving a harbor by expending so much money, could control waterway rates as well as through commissions we now control railroad rates?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That may be true, but we have not that question before us at this time.

Mr. FREAR. I understand; but it is a question which has suggested itself.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Whatever control the Government may have of such things is the result or will have to be the result of legislation. But we have not now that matter before us.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Did the gentleman move to strike out the Winyah Bay item?

Mr. FREAR. No; I moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I think this appropriation should be made for Winyah Bay. The gentleman discussed the lumber commerce of the country and rather disparaged it, because he did not think the value would be as great as that of ordinary merchandise. Commerce here is not confined to lumber. Several years ago I took a Clyde Line steamer and went into Winyah Bay, destined for Georgetown. The steamer had a mixed cargo of merchandise. It also had passengers, but it did not reach Georgetown on time, because, although it only drew about 13 feet of water, it stuck in the mud, and we had to wait for the tide to help us into Georgetown. It seemed to me then that this historical old town, named after "the Father of His Country," or rather King George, ought to receive some consideration at the hands of the Federal Government. The vessel I traveled on was carrying general merchandise; it was part of a regular steamship line, which ought not to be subject to a mud bath every time it tried to get into the town named after King George.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows, of course, because he knows everything about river and harbor improvements——

Mr. DYER. Except the Mississippi River.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Coming from the farmer's special friend, I am delighted with the compliment.

Mr. LEVER. That one of the largest sawmill companies in the world is located at Georgetown, S. C.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. LEVER. And the gentleman must know that within the last two months there has been growing up a large immigration from the State of Indiana——

Mr. COX. Good people.

Mr. LEVER. Of farmers who are going into that section about Georgetown, buying up land and going into the business of intensive agriculture, so that that section of the State promises to be in the near future one of the most progressive agricultural sections of the entire southern country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish to say to the gentleman from South Carolina that, entirely independent of the information he has given to the House as an expert, which he is, on the subject of farming, I have traced out, through experts in the Department of Agriculture, the fact that the land in this vicinity—which has not been opened up because of the lack of railroads and the wretched condition of many of the waterways—is of the richest sort, and simply awaits an improvement of this kind to induce settlers to go there and make the land fructify and engage in world-wide commerce.

Mr. COX. The gentleman need not worry. Indianians have gone down there, and they will make it fructify.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So long as the gentleman from Indiana is on the job he will hold the Indiana farmer where he is; but as soon as that farmer can break away——

Mr. COX. If the gentleman can introduce some plan to get some Indiana farmers over into Pennsylvania, they will reduce the price of his eggs.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have been paying enough for them; but I am glad to see the gentleman from Indiana with us on this proposition. We do not like to have vessels stuck in the mud when they are trying to get into Georgetown with Indiana products or the products of any other State.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania is insisting that the people contribute down there toward this improvement? If he is insisting now that those people there be called upon to make further contributions than they have already made——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I am making no such proposition.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Or is this to be spent on the Atlantic seaboard?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am frank to admit that this is a part of the general project. And I think the Government will get an ample return for its expenditure.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Then I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Great Peedee River, S. C.: For maintenance, $5,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I trust my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will not leave at this moment, because this is for the purpose of permitting him and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] to finish that discussion on the subject of the flood-control bill. I am frank to say that I think the gentleman from Mississippi has really the best of the argument so far, notwithstanding the experience and the ability of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who could see in the last project that Georgetown was named after the "Father of his Country."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It might date back further than that. It might have been named after King George.

Mr. FREAR. The Great Peedee is now under discussion. We have spent $340,300 there, or that has been the amount of the appropriation in the past; $5,000 on hand, and $5,000 is here proposed in the bill. I have simply made a pro forma amendment because I realized there may be some maintenance that will be necessary down there. But the report says, on page 604:

A railroad recently built has caused the marked falling off of the river business.

Now, we have made our investment. We have considerably over a quarter of a million dollars in this stream. A railroad has been built in there. We have put $340,000 in the project, and this further amount is to be put in the Great Peedee and be continued for all time to come. I ask the gentleman in all seriousness what could be the reason for continuing a large project on that river?

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I have only made a pro forma amendment, and I want to get the expert opinion of my friend from Pennsylvania, although I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LEVER. I wish to inquire if the gentleman predicates his opposition to the proposition on the theory that a railroad has been built paralleling the river, and that therefore the Government ought to abandon the improvement of the river in the interest of the railroad?

Mr. FREAR. That is a very proper question. My answer to that would be that I think the Government ought to insist on minimum rates, so that a railroad can not drive commerce off the waterway. And I think the gentleman would probably join me in that.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman thinks by abandoning the river projects you will get these rates?

Mr. FREAR. No; I do not propose abandoning it.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman believes that we should raise these railroad rates so that commerce can live?

Mr. FREAR. If we are going to put money into the stream we ought to protect the Government's investment after it is put there.

Mr. PLATT. I agree with the gentleman, that if we conduct these on business principles we would have to raise railroad rates all over the country to enable the streams to do business. There is not the slightest doubt of that.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the committee to the shipping bill passed at the last session and approved September 7, 1916. Section 18 gives the Shipping Board authority to fix the rates by water carriage in interstate commerce, and reads as follows:

SEC. 18. That every common carrier by water in interstate commerce shall establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable rates, fares, charges, classifications, and tariffs, and just and reasonable regulations and practices relating thereto and to the issuance, form, and substance of tickets, receipts, and bills of lading, the manner and method of presenting, marking, packing, and delivering property for transportation, the carrying of personal, sample, and excess baggage, the facilities for transportation, and all other matters relating to or connected with the receiving, handling, transporting, storing, or delivering of property.

Every such carrier shall file with the board and keep open to public inspection, in the form and manner and within the time prescribed by the board, the maximum rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route; and if a through route has been established, the maximum rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier by water.

No such carrier shall demand, charge, or collect a greater compensation for such transportation than the rates, fares, and charges filed in compliance with this section, except with the approval of the board and after 10 days' public notice in the form and manner prescribed by the board, stating the increase proposed to be made; but the board for good cause shown may waive such notice.

Whenever the board finds that any rate, fare, charge, classification, tariff, regulation, or practice, demanded, charged, collected, or observed by such carrier is unjust or unreasonable, it may determine, prescribe, and order enforced a just and reasonable maximum rate, fare, or charge, or a just and reasonable classification, tariff, regulation, or practice.

It does not give authority to fix the minimum rate, but it does have authority to control and regulate the rates and to require interstate-water carriers to file the maximum rate for transportation between such points in interstate commerce, and goes a very long way toward giving the Shipping Board complete control over rates of water carriers in interstate commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Santee, Wateree, and Congaree Rivers, S. C.: For maintenance, including the Estherville-Minim Creek Canal and the Congaree River as far up as the Gervais Street Bridge, Columbia, $30,000; for improvement of Congaree River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 702, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $50,000; in all, $80,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of the paragraph after the $30,000 item for maintenance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 15, by striking out, after "$30,000," in line 18, the remainder of the paragraph down to and including line 21.

Mr. FREAR. Referring to the Congaree River: On the Santee, Wateree, and the Congaree Rivers the Government has appropriated $1,268,395. On the Congaree River it has appropriated $668,298, of which $43,101 was the last balance reported on hand, and $30,000 is the amount asked for in the bill, which is not objected to, because it is a maintenance proposition. The commerce upon this river, as I have it—and I desire to be corrected if I make a mistake—is 4,324 tons. That hardly seems possible. I desire to be corrected if I am not correct.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I would like to read from the next report, if I may. It says practically all the commerce of this river was conducted by one old stern-wheel steamer of 132 tons, which made 36 trips. That was after $168,238 was expended. I think I was right about the commerce, because I see that the total commerce on this river for three years reached only 14,000 tons. The engineers have asked for a large amount here for bank protection.

Now, beginning with the new poject, which is objected to, reading from page 4, it says:

A steamboat line has been established upon the river and is now in operation, its terminal being just below the lock. The commerce reported amounts to about 4,000 to 12,000 tons annually. It appears there has been a material saving due to the operation of the boat line.

As a matter of fact, we find by taking the report of 1916 that in three years after this large investment of money the total commerce reached only 14,032 tons.

This is document 702. It says:

There is at present nothing which could be described as a "terminal" possessing "terminal facilities," in the usual meaning of these terms. There is only the ordinary river landing, with a small tent to protect the freight at Granby. There are no wharves nor public space available for wharves.

And, reading back, it says:

It appears from the report considered that the required project depth can be secured by dredging, but that with the small dredge in use the time required is so long that before the work is completed a new freshet season has arrived and new shoals are formed, so that at no time is the channel unobstructed.

It appears to the special board that inasmuch as the dredging and staging have not been able to maintain the project, the Government should adopt more adequate means of improving the river. That is in addition to the $168,000 that has already been put in the stream, I take it.

I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike that part of the paragraph out regarding the new project.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take the time of the committee in discussing this item, but in view of what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has said I think it very well, for the RECORD at least, that the facts in this case should be known, and I shall use only my allotted time.

The item of $50,000 proposed to be stricken out is for revetment work on the Congaree River. The situation is this: This system of waterways, the Santee, Wateree, and Congaree Rivers, makes a distance of 208 miles, connecting with Winyah Bay, at Georgetown, as the end of navigation and at Columbia, the capital of the State, as the head of navigation.

Under a project adopted more than 30 years ago a 4-foot channel was guaranteed on this river for 12 months in the year. There has been some navigation under the existing project. There have been repeated efforts to put on a substantial boat line. But the difficulty has been found in the fact that at two points on the river we have caving banks and sand bars, which have made it almost impossible to carry on a 12-month, all-the-year navigation, with the result that boats could not keep their published schedules at Georgetown, where they connect with the Clyde Line, and therefore in a large measure commerce failed to materialize as hoped and anticipated.

It is true that there has been expended $668,000 on this proposition, but with an expenditure of $50,000, as recommended by the engineers advising the committee, it is proposed to make this a navigable stream 12 months in a year, with a 4-foot channel for a distance of 208 miles.

The Chief of Engineers in his report, Document No. 702, says:

I therefore report that the further improvement of the Congaree River, of South Carolina, seems advisable to the extent of obtaining a 4-foot navigable channel assisted by a properly devised bank protection—

And so forth.

The $50,000 proposed in the bill is for the purpose of protecting the banks at Gill and Congaree Creeks, so as to prevent the sand from coming in and filling up the channel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Not now. Let me make just one further statement. I read further from this document, to this effect:

Unless the channel below the lock is made more stable and permanent and the low-water depth of about 4 feet secured, the expenditures already made—

Six hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars, as the gentleman from Wisconsin properly said—will be of little benefit. It seems advisable, therefore, to undertake some additional work, with a view to securing a permanent channel of about 4 feet depth at low-water stages under proper supervision.

Now, then, the proposition is to make available to the public the benefits of an expenditure of $668,000 by appropriating $50,000 more. If that is not a proposition of sound, common, ordinary, South Carolina, Wisconsin horse sense, I do not know where you can find one. Here we have expended our money. We have made our river navigable, with the exception of two points, involving a distance of 7 miles, which can not be put into good condition except by revetting the banks and keeping them from rolling into the river, at an expenditure of $50,000. And yet, with that sense of economy which some of us can not understand, some gentlemen are willing to fall back into the breast chains and declare we will not spend the other $50,000. It does not seem to me to be good business. It may be in Wisconsin, in the gentleman's district. It is not in South Carolina.

Now, one further point: It is true that the commerce of this river does not show very large in comparison with that of some other rivers and with some other projects, probably, and yet it is due to the fact that we have not had the 4-foot channel which was guaranteed to us by Congress in 1885, more than 30 years ago. If you will give us a 4-foot all-the-year channel, I think I can safely guarantee that in a year from the completion of the project the commerce of this river will have doubled, tripled, quadrupled, even more than that; and as proof of that I desire to read into the RECORD a statement received recently from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Columbia, S. C., which reads as follows:

Since our last conference with you, and at the time of the meeting when you addressed us so forcibly on the subject of this work and the efforts you would make to secure this appropriation, a great deal of interest has been stimulated in the larger development of traffic on the waterway between Columbia and Georgetown, and I am pleased to report that we have interested some parties who have expressed their willingness to join our merchants in the organization of an adequate navigation company and the construction of terminals and warehouses. This work is estimated to cost between $150,000 and $200,000, and in addition to the terminal facilities will consist of a fleet of powerful towboats and barges capable of handling an enormous amount of tonnage on the river. Of course, the organization of this company is predicated upon the fact that we will have all-the-year navigation, and continuously without interruption on a minimum depth of 4 feet. Another incentive to the establishment of this line is the prediction being freely made that there will be a considerable advance in the rail rates between the East and Columbia within the near future, and this would naturally give a larger margin of profit to the water line, and therefore increase the ability to maintain such line on basis of a fair and remunerative revenue.

That is the latest statement that we have upon the proposition. Make available this $50,000, which will give us this 4-foot channel, and here is a guaranty of the beginning at once of a barge line involving an expenditure by private individuals and citizens of Columbia of $200,000. Now, let me say this further to the gentleman from Wisconsin——

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. In just one moment. The head of navigation on this river is the city of Columbia, S. C. That city is in the very center of the State of South Carolina. From it radiate nine great trunk lines of railroad reaching every part of the State of South Carolina. It has been my hope and my dream that by the improvement of the Congaree River Columbia, S. C., will become the wholesale distributing depot for heavy freight for practically the entire State of South Carolina. With these facts, does not the gentleman think we have made a good case?

Mr. FREAR. I think the gentleman has made an unconscious misstatement. I know he would not do it purposely. On page 615 of the last Army Engineer's report it says—

A channel suitable for 4-foot navigation at all but extremely low-water stages has been secured by snagging——

Mr. LEVER. What report is that?

Mr. FREAR. This is the Engineer's report for 1916, just out. We have spent $668,000 on the stream. We have secured only 14,000 tons in three years, or a little over 4,000 tons a year, which is only approximately one trainload a year. I do not question, of course, but what eventually there may be some commerce, but it seems to me that is a fair test, and we have 4-foot navigation for the project, according to the report.

Mr. LEVER. I desire to extend my remarks on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. FREAR. I offered an amendment to strike out the new proposition, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Altamaha, Oconee, and Ocmulgee Rivers, Ga.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $40,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this to make an inquiry from any of my good friends from Georgia in reference to these three rivers. I find from the engineer's report that we have expended on the Altamaha River, $259,000; on the Oconee, $279,000; and on the Ocmulgee, $492,000. The engineer also says that the Macon-Atlantic Navigation Co. operated a new self-propelled steel barge from Macon to the mouth of the river during the last five months of the year and anticipates putting on another self-propelled barge, whatever that may mean, about August, 1916. My inquiry has to do with the hearings held by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors last year, in which the advocates of the proposition at that time testified about this boat line. They had had a good deal of trouble to get a boat of light enough draft to run on the river and had tried all kinds of experiments. Mr. Long testified that finally they did find a European article which would draw little enough water so that they could put it in a boat and bring it over here. They selected "the Bollinger engine, manufactured at Stockholm, which requires 28 cents an hour to run it," so the gentleman testified. He goes on and describes what a great engine it is. I am coming now to my inquiry. The testimony continued—

We put an electric plant on this boat. We can blow a horn, or rather a whistle, by electricity, and do various other things. We have a number of conveniences—

And so on. I think I brought this matter up last year, and I would like to make inquiry whether on any one of those three rivers up to date any one has ever heard that remarkable whistle blown? After the expenditure on the three rivers of something over $1,000,000 it is well worthy of knowledge whether that great event, the blowing of the electric whistle on the one boat running on those rivers, has ever been heard up to date? [Laughter.] It is a wonderful thing. We ought to know all about how that whistle sounds, which seems to be about all the result the Government has secured for such an enormous expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Satilla River, Ga.: for maintenance, $2,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in line 18. I have made no motion in reference to some of the items which have been presented to me, but it occurs to me that it is well for us to see where our investments have gone in past years, and what results we are getting on the money that is being expended. Taking the proposition that was read a moment ago for Fancy Bluff Creek, Ga., it is only a small appropriation, it is true, but in 1915 the office expenses were $725, and there were no operations at all on the river. The commerce was 2,513 tons, of which 1,565 was timber and ties rafted, leaving only 948 tons of commerce on that creek. The cost for office expenses, for carrying on the work on that river, for overlooking it, according to the engineer's report, was $725. One launch makes trips on the river. I submit that that is a situation that calls for criticism somewhere at sometime. Why are we paying $725 for office expenses for an annual tonnage of 948 tons?

Take Satilla River, Ga., the item that has just been read, for maintenance, $2,000. It is a small item, but in 1915 there was no operations on the river, yet $519 was spent for office expenses last year. The commerce was 67,000 tons, which looks reasonably large; but logs, timber, and timber products reached 63,000 tons—more on that stream than on the other—leaving a net of a little less than 4,000 tons. One steamboat makes two trips a week; it does not say where; but this is a situation where, as on the preceding stream, we are performing no work at all, we are making no improvement, and yet on the former project we spent last year $725 for office expenses for 948 tons, and on this project $519 for a little less than 4,000 tons outside of the timber. These facts speak for themselves.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, whatever it was. My attention has been called to a point which I neglected to state in connection with the three rivers of which mention was just made. I infer that our honorable colleague and friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] attended a performance in town last evening, in which a steamboat was one of the principal features displayed. Instead of a whistle, such as the boat to ply on the three rivers just mentioned has, bells are prominent in the sketch. In the course of the performance, there is a lady who seems to have various gentlemen friends aboard of the boat who are particularly cordial to her. Her husband says she is a somnambulist and follows bells. Naturally each gentleman begins ringing a bell to attract the attention of the unfortunate but handsome lady. Now, I suggest that the advocates of the Altamaha, Oconee, and Ocmulgee Rivers take the electric whistle and use it as an attraction for the lady somnambulist. I know of no better way in which this appropriation could be used if the Government is to receive any return whatever for this expenditure of public money. If there is water enough to float the boat, the wonderful whistle might call to the shores the beautiful girls who no doubt live along the banks.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I know of no better time to say a serious word than the present. The gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, who is going to support the bill although he thinks it has some objectionable items, not including Boston Harbor, of course, has made merry over the Altamaha, Oconee, and Ocmulgee Rivers, and is inclined to satirize the power boat that seems to be doing service down there.

Having been in this vicinity, and having observed that men in good faith undertook to improve local conditions by putting a steamboat service on these rivers, I am not inclined to make fun of them. It is an easy thing for one coming from a great city having large appropriations to make light of a smaller community, where the river has not been improved and where men are making desperate efforts with the small means at their command to do business. But if we are to improve the big streams we can not consistently deny assistance to the smaller streams which are the feeders of the larger streams. These three rivers feed larger river territory. These three rivers penetrate a country that is not penetrated by railroads or by navigable streams through which the people can get their products to market. Now, what comes out of these three streams?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mud. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Cotton, fertilizer, naval stores, lumber, staves, timber, and a variety of merchandise, and at the mere mention of these substantial things a few gentlemen from the larger cities cry, "Mud." Well, it may be "to laugh" with them; their items are secure in the bill, but it is not a square deal to the smaller communities who have just as much right to consideration as the larger cities. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Am I correct in the impression I have that the gentleman is in favor of this bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman's question carries its own answer. I have been in this section of country, and I want to say solemnly and seriously that many views I formerly had of rivers and harbors and the river and harbor bill have changed. After the Civil War these streams were blocked up and stagnated by reason of the conditions over which the people of the community had no control. Great plantations that had formerly used these streams had gone to pieces. Boats had been sunk in these rivers, the logs and timbers had fallen, and fever and ague prevailed.

Why, I have listened to some very eloquent gentleman upon this side of the House discuss the days of fever and ague in Illinois and Indiana, and I have observed that after their streams were improved the health of the people improved, and the streams began to carry commerce back and forth. I have come to believe that the far Southern States have as much right to have these waterways of theirs clarified and purified and made navigable as did the people of Indiana and Illinois and as do the people of Pennsylvania and New York. [Applause.]

I venture to say that no man who scans this bill item for item will be able to produce a table showing that there is any undue contrast between the amount appropriated that goes into the Southern States and the amount appropriated that goes into the States along the northern tier of States. The showing will not be prejudicial to the South. To improve these choked-up rivers is not only an aid to navigation, it is in the interest of the public health, and it is the least we can do, for we are in constant contact with the people of the South, to aid them in cleaning out these streams. It is doing something for the general welfare when we say to the man upstream who has only a few bales of cotton to sell that we will help him to put that cotton on a barge and carry it downstream to Macon or Savannah in order that it may go aboard the big ships that carry it to the great cities of Boston, Philadelphia, and New York. I for one want the man in the interior to have that chance.

Here is a steamboat that carries lumber, cotton, staves, and other commodities from Macon to Savannah. I am told there are now two steamboats in operation. The gentleman ridicules it because it has a whistle. It seems to me that that whistle will sound louder in the world of progress than any echo emanating from any Member of Congress who is dissatisfied with this bill. That whistle means that they are taking a new interest in industry in the South and are struggling to get out of the backwoods. We ought to give the southern farmer a chance to come out and amount to something in this world. [Applause.] He can do it on the waterways.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

St. Marys River, Ga. and Fla.: For maintenance, $7,000; for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 540, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, $15,000; in all, $22,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of referring to this project, and, incidentally, to suggest something in regard to some remarks of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who seems to think that the reason for the loss of traffic in these southern streams is because these streams have been blocked up, and that after all these years a boat has finally been placed on them because of improvement. There is one thing that the gentleman said in his interesting speech in which I concur very strongly, and that is that there should be no distinction between improvements for the North and improvements for the South. No one believes that there should be. There has been no such criticism. My criticism was made as much on northern projects as on southern.

The upper Mississippi is one of the best channels in the world to-day. Senator Burton said there was 4½ feet throughout the upper Mississippi, but the commerce is practically gone, not because the river is blocked up. You will see some commerce mentioned in the report. When we get to it I shall refer to it and tell you what the commerce is, because I have been up and down there, and I will also give you the report of the people along the stream; but I say now that it has lost 90 per cent of its commerce on the upper river, not because the stream was blocked up, but because conditions have changed. That condition will continue to exist with reference to the smaller streams unless the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina can be put into effect, respecting the enforcement of minimum rates, and thereby prevent railroad competition from carrying traffic away from the stream.

I wish now to refer to the St. Marys River. According to Document 540, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, they have a channel of 17 feet at mean low water, and they desire to have a 20-foot channel. The reason for that, which seems to be urged strongly, is that over at Fernandina they have a deeper channel, and they ought to have similar conditions at St. Marys. I read further from this document, beginning on page 5:

The entrance to Cumberland Sound has been improved, at a cost of $3,500,000, and affords a depth over the bar of 24 feet at low water. Very extensive jetty work has been built at this place and an enormous amount of material has been scoured out by the action of the current alone. Work has also been done by dredging, and more is contemplated, with a view to widening and also straightening the channel. No advantage at present can be had from this extensive and costly improvement, except what results to the harbor of Fernandina, Fla. This harbor is situated on Amelia Island and is difficult of approach by rail.

4. In any commercial harbor the land approaches are just as important and worthy of consideration as the water approaches, and it is readily seen by an examination of the map that Fernandina is not conveniently accessible by rail to a wide extent of country. St. Marys, being situated on the mainland of Georgia, in a part of the country which is rapidly developing, might well become an important commercial harbor, but to become so it must be usable, and the work of improving the waterway must precede the construction of the land approaches.

The St. Marys has only had small appropriations thus far—something like $22,000. This bill carries $7,000 for maintenance, outside of a new project, but the commerce is largely logs and timber, the same as on these other streams, logs which, of course, are floated. It is said that the commerce amounts to 100,000 tons; but, deducting those products, it resolves itself down to less than 5,000 tons.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I suggest to the gentleman that if he will deduct the remaining five thousand, there will not be any left.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, yes; that is true; but I am speaking about a 17-foot channel for timber products which you now have, and yet you ask for a 20-foot channel, not for the timber products, but for the 4,901 tons remaining. The project is completed, and yet here is a new project. I am not moving to strike out the project. I simply call attention to the fact as shown by the reports.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tampa Harbor and Channels, Fla.: For maintenance of Hillsboro Bay, $60,000; for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1345, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $300,000; in all, $360,000: Provided, That nothing in this bill nor in the act approved June 25, 1910, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," shall be so construed as to prevent the use of any part of the Ybor Estuary zone for industrial or other legitimate purposes when the same is not needed for commercial uses, nor to exclude the building and operation of a railroad or railroads by private parties or railroad companies under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, subject to the right of the city of Tampa to construct and operate a municipal railroad on said estuary zone as set forth in said report.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Provided," at the end of line 2, page 18, insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $1,125,000, exclusive of the amounts herein and heretofore appropriated: Provided further."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, my reasons for offering this amendment are twofold. In the first place, it seems to me that in a large harbor like that of Tampa, where the Government takes on such a project as this, and as meritorious as we know it to be, the Government can very readily enter into a continuing contract and thereby save quite large sums of money. I realize that at times this principle has not been advocated, but nevertheless it is a good business policy. I simply have offered the amendment in accordance with the report of the engineers, which will make this improvement of Tampa Harbor a continuing project, and to the amount that is called for by the engineers' report in House Document 1345, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.

That is the business standpoint from which I offer the amendment. I also offer it from a sentimental standpoint. It has been my privilege to serve upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the past two Congresses, during a period of four years. During all of that time the honored chairman of the committee has served this House, Congress, and the Government with great ability, capacity, and success. [Applause.] I know others will say words of praise of the chairman of the committee at the completion of the reading of the bill, but it will not be my place at that time as one of the younger Members to be accorded that privilege. I think, Mr. Chairman, that after a Member has completed 22 years of faithful service in this House on one committee, having been for three Congresses chairman of that important committee, and when he has performed the duties of that position solely as he has seen them from the standpoint of public welfare, with no selfish interests whatsoever, and when he is about to leave these Halls, Congress could do no better service to itself and to the country than to allow him to return to his home city feeling that the one project in which he has been personally interested—during my connection with the committee at least—shall be carried to completion, and that the authorization of that completion should be made during the time that he himself is a Member of this House. I do not need to say, I am sure, that neither the gentleman himself nor any member of the committee was aware that I was to offer this amendment, but I do it in all sincerity, realizing it will not cost the Government as much money to adopt it to-day as it will to continue the project during the period of four years, and I also do it out of the feeling in my heart of regard for the gentleman in whose district the project appears and who so richly and worthily deserves our commendation. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am very deeply grateful to the gentleman for the kindness which prompts the amendment he has offered. I appreciate it more than I can express in words, but I really must ask the committee not to adopt it. I realize, Mr. Chairman, it would have been better if every project in this bill for which appropriations are made insufficient to complete the various projects could have been put under continuing contract. In many, perhaps in all, cases it would cost much less, as the work could be done more cheaply in that way than by annual appropriations. There are about 25 or 30 of these new projects, for the completion of which no provision is made in this bill. As I stated, I would have preferred if provision by cash or continuing contract could have been made for the completion of all of them, but under the circumstances, in view of Treasury conditions, in view of the idea prevailing that there might be a deficit later on, although I do not think now there will be such at any time, the committee could not see its way clear to provide for the completion of these projects, and I do not think it is right for me to accept for myself what I did not see my way clear to advocate or recommend for others, and for that reason I must, though reluctantly, ask the committee not to adopt the amendment. This I do reluctantly for two reasons——

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. In just a moment—reluctantly, first, because of the appreciation I have for the spirit that prompted the amendment, and, secondly, for the reason that I think the committee would be doing an injustice to others by thus favoring me. I therefore request the committee not to adopt the amendment. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MEEKER. If this amendment be adopted, would not the ultimate completion of that work be done for less money?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think so.

Mr. MEEKER. And the intent of Congress is evidently to complete the work?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is true. The same may be said, however, I think, of every other uncompleted project in the bill. I think it would have been a good business proposition to have placed them all under the continuing contract system if we could have seen our way clear to have done so.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, during my service upon committees very seldom have I voted against the wishes of the chairmen, but this is one time that I trust that the committee will not follow the wishes of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. [Applause.] It will not add any more to the cost of this project, but will probably reduce the cost. It is a meritorious project, and under the circumstances it ought to be unanimously voted in, notwithstanding the protest of our honored friend from Florida.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to indorse what has been said. The amendment is for a commercial proposition, and it is one that is well worthy, and, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] very well said, it is economy for the Government to do it. I believe that nothing could be better than for the chairman of this committee to set an example that ought to be observed by the Government in authorizing contracts that are necessary and which will eventually be performed cheaper by this very course. We can all testify to this fact by voting against the chairman's wishes, and I think it will be the best expression that he can make of doing business in a businesslike way and at the same time extending a deserved compliment to a gentleman whom we all so highly admire. [Applause.]

[Mr. HULBERT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and ask the committee to ignore the request of the chairman. It seems to me that, owing to the importance of the port of Tampa and this particular project and the long services of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, that this committee could in no way better show its appreciation of the long and valuable services of the chairman than in voting to put this particular item upon the continuing contract basis. It will not cost the Government a single dollar more, but will probably save money in the end, and it insures the completion of the project, regardless of whether any river and harbor bill will be passed in the future. I think one and all will bear me out when I say that to know the distinguished chairman of this committee is to like him. He is easily approached; he is painstaking and considerate on all occasions; and I think one and all will bear testimony that the many acts of kindness and courtesy extended will ever grow in the recollection of his colleagues and associates through their journey of life in the years to come, and I desire to say at this time that it matters not wherever his life's journey hereafter may take him, whether into the civil walks of life or again back to the Halls of this Congress in answer to the call of legislative duty, I wish for him prosperous hours and pleasant days, and trust that it will vouchsafe for him joyous smiles, radiant as when first he greeted me. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. HULBERT. I ask unanimous consent that I may have read from the Clerk's desk a very brief article from to-day's New York Times.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the article referred to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States:

Our country is to be congratulated upon your true presentation of Americanism. Every American devoted to the Declaration of Independence must regard your message to the Senate with pride and approval.

The quality, the representative Government, and the pursuit of happiness, the keystone of the Republic, you have accurately expressed. While it is true that traditional American policy is opposed to entangling alliances with European nations, it is also true that this opposition is predicated upon the dangers such entanglement with imperialism would bring to democracy. If the world espouses our ideals, the danger no longer exists.

I would consider myself recreant to every activity in which I have been engaged, to every word I have uttered and written on this matter, if, in view of all that has been said and done, I did not commend your twentieth century promulgation of Americanism to the world.

In speaking of Poland as a concrete case, you have spoken for Ireland, Belgium, and other small nations. The document is the greatest American paper since Lincoln's emancipation proclamation. It is my earnest wish and, I know, the wish of every member of our society that it may reestablish truth and justice in the world, for such a world is a world of peace.

JEREMIAH A. O'LEARY,
President American Truth Society.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have an editorial published in to-day's Washington Times read at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that an editorial published in to-day's Washington Times be read at the Clerk's desk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S PEACE ADDRESS.

President Wilson's address to the Senate yesterday reveals him as the great American peril. If we are destined to be entangled in the near future in war or in minor embroilment with any or all of the powers now at war, it may be set down as certain that the catastrophe will be the outcome of his amazing indiscretion.

His address is calculated to give greater or less offense to every country now at war except Germany and Austria, and it must convey small satisfaction to these latter. It is, in fact, so vague in its conceptions and so indefinite in its expressions that almost any meaning may be read into its more or less flowing periods, and every Government or people that chooses may take umbrage at some one or other of the implied proposals. The truth of this will become more and more apparent as the views of the European newspapers are matured and recorded—probably in a day of two, when they sufficiently overcome their astonishment to size up the real purport of this strange upwelling of inchoate humanitarianism.

Perhaps the strangest sentence of all is that in which Mr. Wilson says, "I am speaking as an individual." How can the President of the United States speak on world politics as an individual? He seems to see the point in the next sentence, but the perception of his responsibility as "the head of a great Government" does not check him. He goes on to settle the affairs of the universe in the first person singular with a rapt conviction characteristic rather of Peter the Hermit or John of Leyden than of a serious twentieth century statesman. Indeed, the speech as a whole is rather a dithyramb than a political thesis. So far as it means anything, it is epileptiform in its fatuity, but for the most part it baffles all serious interpretation in the complicated beauties of its own verbiage.

Its essential vacuity does not prevent it from being full of injurious possibilities. There is the passage, for instance, regarding "a united, independent, and autonomous Poland." What does it mean? Is it an indorsement of Germany's impudent hoax, the erection out of Russian territory of a buffer State under Prussian domination for the protection and aggrandizement of the central powers? If so, how will England, France, and Italy receive the idea? Or is it an indorsement of the Russian plan for a Poland built up out of Prussian, Austrian, and Russian conquests? If the latter, what will they say of it in Vienna and Berlin?

Then there is the pronouncement on that sounding but absolutely hollow and meaningless phrase, "the freedom of the seas." What is Mr. Wilson's idea of such freedom? Does he contemplate giving over the Bosphorus and Dardanelles to Russia? Or does he mean driving England out of Suez and Gibraltar? Does he contemplate excluding Italian and Austrian warships from the Adriatic or to forbid Britain to blockade the Ems and the outlet of the Skager-Rack? May Germany bind England in a ring of submarines, or may Russia blockade the Baltic ports of Germany? And what of the Panama Canal? Are we to give up all jurisdiction over it?

It makes the average man's head swim to regard the various possibilities of "the freedom of the seas," "free access to the open paths of the world's commerce." These phrases are a German invention, dating back to the end of 1914 or beginning of 1915, when the economic pressure of the British fleet began to tell in the war. They mean the disarmament of England—simply this and nothing more. How are we to expect England will receive Mr. Wilson's solemn indorsement of the proposition, uttered in the august presence of the United States Senate?

Besides, there are so many things left unsaid in the President's harangue. Poland, indeed! But what word is there of Belgium or Serbia? What allusion is there to the martyrization of Armenia? To the new threat against Switzerland? There is to be no victory in the war; only a peace between equals! "Mankind is looking now for freedom of life, not for equipoises of power." We confess to inability to get any distinct significance from this portion of the President's remarks. His ideas seem to us to belong to the realm of dreamland, where everything is balmy but elusive, roseate but shifting, and unstable as the forms in a kaleidoscope.

This is the sort of peace which the United States will not be allowed to help in concluding, but which this country is, nevertheless, to set the seal of permanence upon by becoming its guarantor. In doing this it appears we are not violating the tradition which comes down to us from the Father of His Country, warning us to avoid entangling alliances with the nations of Europe, for the curious reason that "there is no entangling alliance in a concert of power." Plainly it must differ in some occult way from a concert of powers, which, as Mr. Wilson himself inferentially, if not directly, shows us is the surest way to competition, jealousy, hostility, and belligerency.

No greater puzzle for the historian has ever been placed upon the page of time than this move of Mr. Wilson, sprung without warning upon a dismayed people and a disconcerted world. What was the genesis of it? Who prompted it? What is the true motive? What does Mr. Wilson expect to accomplish? Conundrums to the ordinary mind, without an answer consistent with honor and common sense!

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed therein a joint resolution of the California Legislature, asking that Congress enact certain legislation for the benefit of certain oil operators in the State of California.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, has this resolution heretofore been incorporated by the action of another body?

Mr. CHURCH. Oh, no. This resolution has just been passed during the last week.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The following is the resolution referred to:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Frank C. Jordan, secretary of state of the State of California, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of assembly joint resolution No. 2 of the Forty-second Legislature of the State of California with the original now on file in my office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof. I further certify that this authentication is in due form and by the proper officer.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and have caused the great seal of the State of California to be affixed hereto this 19th day of January, A. D. 1917.

[SEAL.]

FRANK C. JORDAN,
Secretary of State,
By FRANK H. CORY, Deputy.

Assembly joint resolution No. 2, relating to the oil industry of the State of California.

Whereas the oil industry of California is in a demoralized condition, caused by litigation instituted and threatened by the United States Government against bona fide operators, who entered upon and were developing public lands in good faith at the time of their withdrawal, and continued such development under the law, as they were legally advised it to be, until by such efforts they greatly increased the production of oil and, in some instances, were the means of opening up new oil fields; and

Whereas unless Congress settles by a law these vexatious disputes the present litigations will probably continue for many years, resulting in great hardship to the operators by preventing the marketing of their oil, and to the public by reason of constantly increasing the price of gasoline and oil due to the stoppage by the Government of the operation of large areas of this land, and also resulting in many instances in bankrupting the small operators who have not the resources to stand years of expensive litigations against the United States Government; and

Whereas we firmly believe that justice requires that the Government shall legalize the claims of all locators who were actually developing such land in good faith at the time of its withdrawal: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully request the Congress to enact such legislation as will legalize the rights of these operators; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be, and he is hereby, directed to send a certified copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the President of the Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Interior.

C. C. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
WM. D. STEPHENS,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

FRANK C. JORDAN,
Secretary of State,
By FRANK H. CORY, Deputy.

The Clerk read as follows:

Apalachicola Bay, Fla.: For maintenance, $14,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of calling attention to the last two items, and in view of the fact that another item that we are approaching will be considered in that same connection.

Apalachicola Bay has received $516,000 thus far. Eleven thousand dollars balance on hand, and by this bill it carries $14,000 more. The commerce upon that stream is 22,947 tons, of which the timber products reach 9,334 tons, or a balance of 13,613 tons. After expending over half a million dollars on this stream we have a total of less than 23,000 tons, and after deducting timber products, about 13,000 tons or a little over that is about a dollar a ton for interest and maintenance.

Now, the St. Andrews project has had $264,563. This bill asks for $36,000 more. The project has been completed. The average maintenance expense, I understand, is about $35,000 per year. The commerce on this stream is 130,479 tons, according to page 2354 of the Engineer's report. Timber products reach over 100,000 tons, leaving a net commerce on this item, deducting timber products, of about 29,925 tons.

Timber is a fair commerce, although temporary. There is no criticism as to that. But why not have local contribution when the cost is so heavy. Beyond that, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that, with the timber commerce eliminated, the commerce on the stream on which we have paid over half a million dollars is only 13,613 tons; and the St. Andrews stream affords only a little more result for the large expenditure of money we have made on that stream.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Oklawaha, River, Fla.: For maintenance, $5,000; for improvement in accordance with the project set forth on page 17 of House Document No. 514, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $100,000: Provided, That the channel outside of the locks provided for in said report shall be constructed to a depth of 4 feet above the mouth of Silver Springs Run; in all, $105,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after line 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, beginning with line 22, strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. FREAR. This refers to the Oklawaha River, and for the new project that has been proposed, and in reading the preceding statistics regarding the other two streams I did it to show the waste of money which we are proposing when we adopt this project. After an expenditure of about $100,000—$98,000 is the appropriation that we have made, but, of course, there is a large expense for water hyacinth and other expenditures the Government has made upon that stream—I want to read, because I was corrected yesterday, and improperly, as I believe, from statistics as shown on page 2302 of the Engineer's report for 1916. Here is what it shows:

Logs, cypress and pine, 27,624 tons; total commerce on that river, 29,393 tons—which puts it at the identical figures, as I said, and that is something over 1,700 tons after an expenditure of over $100,000.

The Oklawaha River, Mr. Chairman, has been discussed quite frequently. It has been suggested that it is partially a reclamation project. The cost as proposed by the Board of Engineers, an estimated cost, as proposed here, is $733,000, in addition to what we have put into the stream for original construction, and $12,000 per annum for maintenance, subject to local conditions, recommended by the board. The first recommendation asked for by the Army engineers is $175,000. The subsequent appropriation should be sufficient to complete the work in four years. This bill does not propose to carry out the wishes of the Board of Engineers.

I call attention at this time to the enormous waste of money in view of those other two projects which I read. Here we propose, for 1,700 tons of commerce, to expend three-quarters of a million dollars, cost of $12,000 for maintenance a year, and substantially about $18,000 a year for interest, which means about $30,000 a year for interest and maintenance that we will have for this stream and for the small commerce which has been shown.

I read from page 5 of House Document No. 514, Sixty-third Congress:

It is believed that the present and prospective commerce is sufficient to warrant the United States in undertaking this improvement along the lines proposed by the district officer, at a total estimated cost of $733,000 and $12,000 annually for maintenance, provided that any land necessary for the construction of the waterway shall be given to the United States without charge.

And then it is suggested that this is the condition on which this improvement is to be made: That they shall establish and operate a boat line over this waterway which will be competitive with the railroads and not subject to control or purchase by a railroad or other corporate interest.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, the absurdity of that condition being placed in the Army Engineer's report—that a boat line is to be established there that will be competitive with the railroads and not subject to control or purchase by a railroad or other corporate interest.

What is the method of providing for that? Say that a boat is to be placed upon this stream. I presume there is no regular boat there now, although there may be pleasure boats there. They must place a boat line there that will not be interfered with. How long? For 5 years or for 10 years? What is the restriction to be placed by the engineers? Upon that simple restriction it is proposed that an expenditure, approximately, of three-quarters of a million dollars shall be made.

On another page of the report it is said that—

At this time a railroad was built from the St. Johns to Fort Mason. At that time transportation on the St. Johns River was provided for by a line of steamers by the means before mentioned. Railroad and lake navigation at the head of Lake Oklawaha was afforded reasonable facilities to markets at reasonable rates.

So that this project, it seems, is purely for the purpose of providing waterway transportation, notwithstanding railroads reach close to the river at various points. If there be any question of trying to force railroad rates down, as is presented in some of these reports, that can be done by going to the State railroad commission.

Now, I do not intend to take any more time on this, except to suggest that I have before me a report dated Washington, December 11, in which the Army engineers refuse to recommend the improvement of the St. Croix River, which runs beside the town in which I live, because the commerce only reaches about 7,000 tons. During the summer season 8,500 passengers were carried on that river. This stream runs to the great park region a few miles above. I presume that a hundred thousand passengers are carried on the trains, largely to those places. That has been in past years one of the greatest streams of the North, so far as logging and rafting are concerned. I believe the engineers did right. That stream runs past my home. I can not see how justly, in view of the facts as I know them to exist, they could propose to increase the appropriation for that stream beyond maintenance, although it was asked for by some local people.

Recently there was a proposition that a canal be put on that river, to cost something like $8,000,000. The Army engineers were not in favor of it. There was nothing to justify it, because the canal would have been a wasteful project, so far as we could ascertain, and they decided against the people of Wisconsin and Minnesota who came down in behalf of that proposition. I believe they decided right in the action that they have taken.

Under leave I add to this statement the following concerning the Oklawaha project:

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 3, page 937, appears an extract from the Leesburg (Fla.) Commercial, of December 29, 1916, placed in the RECORD by Mr. CLARK of Florida. In that article extended in the RECORD with commendable dispatch after its publication appears the statement:

It is true that this recognition was never given until the South had sent into the Senate and House of Representatives so many men of force and ability that recognition was literally choked from the unwilling throats of those who had long done all the shouting and all the planning and had reaped all the harvests. * * * Now that the South is coming somewhat into its own, now that the waters of the South are being offered to the attention of the Nation * * * there has arisen a cry of "pork." * * * Mr. FREAR is from Wisconsin, and to those who are near enough to see the development of his cry of crookedness (the Oklawaha River) his purist pleas are grotesque. * * * For instance, he holds up his hands in horror, figuratively speaking, at the dreadful waste of three-quarters of a million dollars upon a few hundred swamp dwellers along the banks of a crooked river, the Oklawaha. * * * He never heard of Leesburg and Eustis and Tavares and Mount Dora.

THE CAUSE FOR OPPOSITION.

The country expects Congress to do justice to the Oklawaha, to Leesburg, and to Florida without fear or prejudice. In response to suggestions in the article, let me say that anyone who arrays section against section for the purpose of exciting prejudice is not performing any public service; but if sectionalism results in extravagance, it ought to be frankly discussed. So far as I know, the people of Florida, individually and collectively, are just as good as the people of any other State; and with this admission made in good faith, I desire briefly to reply to criticism coming from the Leesburg purveyor of knowledge, inserted by the gentleman from Florida's second district, and to discuss further the merits of the Oklawaha $733,000 new project contained in the pending bill.

The charge is that the South, by literally choking the North, has come into its own because so many men of "force and ability" are now coming from the South. I do not question the force and ability of any Member, North or South, nor the fact that, viewed from the Leesburg standpoint, Florida has come into its own. My objection is that Wisconsin and the country is largely paying wasteful bills for Florida and many other localities, and as a citizen and Representative of my State and of the country I seek to secure public understanding of the fact that taxpayers are paying for waste wherever located. Further, that it is unjust to the tax-paying public for Congress to load such burdens upon them.

MONEY GIVEN WITHOUT CHOKING.

In order to show long-continued generous treatment by the Government of Florida's waterways, permit me to say that, as nearly as can be estimated, Florida has received about $20,000,000 in waterway appropriations. Some of these waterways are interstate and a small portion, possibly 10 per cent, should properly be borne by the adjoining State of Georgia, if any such division be deemed necessary. For the same reason it is impossible to say exactly what portion is properly chargeable to a particular district, but the second district, recently reapportioned, has been generously treated. For many years this district was represented by the gentleman who inserted the article in the RECORD. Recently his district was changed to exclude several old counties and include several new ones; none of the latter, however, have any considerable waterways. For that reason, and in order to show exceptionally generous treatment by the Government of Florida and the second district, whether choked from the North or given voluntarily, I append projects formerly in that old district with two in the new. The list following indicates liberal appropriations compared to the actual commerce served, whatever may have been the inducement:

WATERWAY PROJECTS CREDITED TO THE SECOND DISTRICT.

St. Marys River, Nassau County	$22,450
Savannah to Fernandina, Nassau County	508,608
Fernandina and Cumberland, Nassau County	3,647,510
St. Johns and Cumberland, Nassau County	202,065
St. Johns River, Duvall County	7,527,341
Key West, Dade County	815,500
Indian, St. Lucia County	177,500
Lake Crescent, St. Johns County	25,000
Oklawaha, Marion County	92,621
Cutting Hyacinth, Marion County	161,416
Swaunee, Levy County	85,890
Withlacoochee, Levy County	335,269
Total	13,601,170

While several of these streams are interdistrict and one or two interstate, it is also true that all the waterway projects in the old district are not included in the above list.

WHO PAYS FLORIDA'S BILLS?

Florida, and the second district in particular, having received liberal treatment in both waterways and also public buildings, we find that last year Wisconsin contributed $12,993,916 to the Federal Treasury (Internal-Revenue Report, 1916, p. 50), while Florida's contribution was $1,816,214. The income tax for 1915 was $1,338,284 for Wisconsin and $242,151 for Florida, or Wisconsin's contribution was about five or six times that of Florida. Of course, New York, Illinois, and other large States, paid far more than Wisconsin, but for practical comparisons these two States can be considered. Illinois contributed $10,745,840 for income taxes and $65,287,404 in all, while New York contributed $45,200,057 for income taxes and $104,910,480 in all. Apart from the objectionable practice of wasting public funds either North or South, the injustice of the present locality burden borne by direct locality taxation is emphasized.

So far as can be determined Florida will receive $746,000 in the pending river and harbor bill for old projects, while Wisconsin, with the second largest waterway commerce in the country, receives $82,000, not counting the upper Mississippi, which is a wasteful project, possibly as bad as many of those in Florida, and with an insignificant actual commerce. But this does not tell half the story of Florida's appropriations, because, in addition to $746,000, which is appropriated by this bill to continue old waterway projects in Florida, the bill also carries $457,700 more with which to start several new projects in Florida that engineers estimate will cost $2,215,700 before completion, which will require constant additional appropriations to complete and increase the maintenance charge many thousands annually.

This bill, then, carries for Florida 20 different items, reaching $1,203,700 in cash, and assumes new waterway burdens in that State reaching $2,311,700.

Wisconsin, with many times the actual waterway commerce of Florida, receives $82,000 for old projects and $77,000 for new projects, or a total of $159,000. Can anything be more unfair from a business standpoint, or more unjust to the taxpayers of the country?

If, then, Wisconsin, with a great waterway commerce, pays $6 for every dollar paid by Florida, and receives about 11 per cent of the amount spent in Florida for waterways in 1917, is it not time to inquire why three-quarters of a million more is to be expended on the Oklawaha, which engineers report is a "crooked" stream with practically no commerce, but recommended for another three-quarters of a million?

THE OKLAWAHA PROJECT.

The new project for the Oklawaha, contained in this bill, is for $733,000.

Oklawaha River has received in appropriations from the Government $98,710 thus far, and a good share of $161,416 appropriated for cutting water hyacinth on Florida waters has also been spent on that stream. Apart from a new project involving three-quarters of a million dollars for this same stream, the pending bill contains an item for maintenance of the present project. The Oklawaha is not materially different from many other streams or creeks in Florida and elsewhere contained in every river and harbor bill. In the limited time afforded by debate on one item, in a bill which covers over 350 different items, I desire briefly to present some of the facts disclosed from official reports.

After an expenditure of considerably over $100,000 on this creek, including hyacinth cutting, the 1916 Engineer's Report, page 2302, shows statistics of 29,393 tons of commerce. Of this traffic, 27,624 tons consisted of pine and cypress logs floated on the stream somewhere and were only weighed in the fertile imagination of the Engineers' Department. Of the remaining 1,769 tons of commerce, 1,011 tons consisted of "miscellaneous freight," valued at exactly $10 per ton and hauled blank distance, according to the report. Two passenger boats may carry freight, but the report is not specific. Five per cent of "trade," it is estimated, is carried by water, indicating that the entire trade, apart from logs and miscellaneous, is not large. On page 690 of the 1916 report it is stated that after spending over $100,000 "no effect on freight rates has been observed." Tabulated, the commerce statistics show as follows:

	Tons.
Commerce		29,393
Logs	27,624
Miscellaneous (doubtful)	1,011
		28,635
Net total commerce		758

On page 2301 of the 1916 report it appears that $1,398.26 was spent by Army engineers last year, of which $823.26 was for "field work" and $675 for office expenses. In other words, "office expenses" almost equaled the cost of taking out overhanging bushes, snags, and so forth, that were in the way, and taking out 60 cubic yards of rock, to increase the depth to 4 feet at extreme low water over shoal places. That depth is greater than the depth developed in the channel of the Mississippi River below Keokuk at different times of the year, according to personal knowledge, which is supported by the experience of captains and pilots on the greatest river in the country, and in any event sufficient to provide for 1,769 tons of doubtful commerce distributed throughout 365 days of the year. And for this creek and commerce the Government must now pay $733,000 more, with the single condition that a "boat line" will be put in operation.

PERSONAL KNOWLEDGE OF THE OKLAWAHA.

While I have relied on facts set forth by the Engineer's report, it has been charged that I have no personal knowledge of the Oklawaha. If anything additional to the official report is needed, let me say that a Mississippi River pilot from my own district, who approves my opposition to the enormous waste on the Mississippi, has given me first-hand information of the Oklawaha. He knows the river and has even handled the pilot's wheel on that river. Another man of standing and former high official position, for whom I am sure every member of the Minnesota delegation would vouch, has also voluntarily given me his personal observations of the Oklawaha. A third man from my own district, who owns a winter home on the Oklawaha, has also given me his personal impression of the river. Three men whose standing is high have each confirmed my judgment of the Oklawaha. That judgment is determined by official reports from which I have quoted.

Any disinterested person who reads the Engineer's report—No. 514, Sixty-third Congress—on the Oklawaha must inevitably come to the same conclusion that the new project is indefensible.

LOCALITY PREJUDICE.

It has been claimed that locality prejudice causes opposition to this extravagance. I never care to defend from unjust insinuations and will not do so now, leaving my own condemnation of Mississippi River extravagance along my own district to speak for itself. However, as stated before, another project runs past my own home. It is known as the St. Croix River, which averages about a mile in width for 20 miles near my home, and floats the largest boats that ever run on the Mississippi River. The navigable river is about 75 miles in length, and extends up to the Interstate Park, maintained by Minnesota and Wisconsin, and visited by presumably over 50,000 people every year.

Before a dollar was ever spent by the Government upon that river, I saw continuous rafts of logs and lumber, reaching many millions of tons annually, floated down the river to the Mississippi. Barges of grain and boat loads of freight were sent down daily by a score of steamboats that then plied the river.

During the past 35 years a total of $158,656 have been spent on the river, or about as much as on the Oklawaha, counting hyacinth cutting. After floating several hundred million tons of commerce, according to the judgment of old river men, the 1916 report quotes 1915 commerce at 7,172 tons of lumber and lath and 8,500 passengers, which it may be suggested compares favorably with the Oklawaha. A dozen or more cities and villages are along the river, running in size from cities of over 10,000 population to villages of several hundred.

Nothing has been spent on the river for several years, and in a recent statement the Chief of Engineers said it would be unprofitable for the Government to undertake any new project. Although the river is as large as the upper Mississippi where they join, and has been one of the great commerce-bearing streams of the upper Mississippi Valley, I do not question this finding. Yet if located in Florida, I submit this river would be entitled to millions of dollars of public funds.

I offer this statement not by way of justification for opposing waste, but because I desire to approve of an economical act by the Chief of Engineers, to which my attention has been directed, in refusing to approve any extravagant new project for the St. Croix.

WHY SPEND $750,000 MORE ON THE OKLAWAHA?

Returning to the criticism by a paper published in the village of Leesburg, which was inserted by the Representative from Florida's second district, and which declares appropriations for Florida are now "literally choked" from the taxpaying North because of the force and ability of Florida Members, I will say that whether the waste is North or South, it deserves condemnation, and the new $733,000 Oklawaha project, carrying an annual interest maintenance and lock charge of $27,000, is one of the most wasteful, in my judgment. The Florida paper asks if we have never heard of Leesburg (844 population) or Eustis (529 population), or Tavares (218 population), or Mount Dora (150 population), according to the 1910 census. We have, and in submitting these few remarks I would, indeed, be chargeable with oversight if I failed to mention them separately, and to speak of them with all due respect; but after studying their relative importance in the commercial world, accompanied by the 2-ton or 5-ton per day creek on which they are located, I am yet unconvinced that Wisconsin and other Northern States should put three-quarters of a million dollars more into the Oklawaha. Let Florida do it.

A suggestion that Kissimmee, which gets a public building in the 1917 bill, is not on the Kissimmee River project must be fought out by the belligerent Leesburg village Commercial with the Chief Engineer of the Army. On page 704 of the 1916 report that official says the full project has been completed on the Kissimmee River "from Kissimmee to Istokpoga Creek," all of which is interesting from a geographical viewpoint, if not valuable commercially, in view of the condition of the Kissimmee during eight months of the year. The Kissimmee gets $47,000 additional in this bill, which fact speaks for itself as to this "new project."

With this brief explanation I am content to leave the subject, believing that taxpayers throughout the country will oppose the waste of another three-quarters of a million on the Oklawaha and $47,000 on the Kissimmee, which are only two of scores of indefensible projects that are now hammering at the Treasury doors for public money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield a moment until I can ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will ask leave to extend my remarks, also, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has very peculiar ideas about his opposition to these items. I want to say—and I will put that in the RECORD—that I received a letter, written on January 3 of this year, from the chairman of the local committee at Leesburg, Fla., advocating this improvement—Leesburg is at the head of this improvement—asking me to invite the gentleman from Wisconsin, who had heretofore attacked this item, to make a visit to Florida, stating that they would regard him as their guest from the time he left Washington until the time he got back to Washington; that they would provide him with a boat and a guide, so that he could see this whole stream; and only asking that he would come back here and get upon this floor and state what were his real impressions of the situation.

Under date of January 5 I sent to the gentleman that invitation, and I desire to put into the RECORD my letter to him, in which I stated that if he would indicate when it was convenient for him to start I would see to it that all the arrangements were made.

The gentleman from Wisconsin did not treat me with courtesy enough to answer my letter, but he wrote to the chairman of the committee at Leesburg, under date of January 6, declining that invitation; so that the gentleman stands here to-day opposing this project when he has absolutely no knowledge of the Oklawaha River at all. When I went before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to present this project and to lay before that committee the facts as to it the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is a member of the committee, was conspicuous by his absence. He heard none of the hearings on this project; he absolutely declined to go down there and learn the exact truth, and yet he is willing to stand in this presence and oppose it. What must be thought of a legislator who will recklessly brand as unworthy a project which all the engineers have approved when the facts show beyond question that the legislator is utterly ignorant on the subject?

The correspondence I have referred to is as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Leesburg, Fla., January 3, 1917.

Hon. FRANK CLARK,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CLARK: We understand Congressman FREAR is fighting our Oklawaha project and is making many assertions about it that are not correct.

Thinking that perhaps Mr. FREAR will be fair enough to make a personal investigation, if the opportunity is offered him, we want to ask you to extend him on behalf of this committee an invitation to make a personal inspection of the Oklawaha River as our guest from the time he leaves Washington until he returns. The only condition attached to this proposition being that Mr. FREAR agrees to state on the floor of the House the exact impression he gains from the investigation.

The Oklawaha River, if improved as per the bill which passed the House in 1914, will save in freight rates in the first year the territory it will serve as much as the project will cost.

Mr. J. D. Young gave Mr. FREAR this same invitation two years ago and it was not accepted. If you will extend this invitation on behalf of our committee and urge that it be accepted, you will very much oblige us.

Very truly, yours, G. G. WARE, Chairman.

JANUARY 5, 1917.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am inclosing herewith the original of a letter just received by me from Mr. G. G. Ware, chairman of the Oklawaha River improvement committee of the Chamber of Commerce of Lake County, Fla., wherein you will observe he authorizes me, in behalf of his committee, to extend to you an invitation to make a personal inspection of Oklawaha River as the guest of the committee named from the time you leave Washington until you return here.

You will note that the only condition attached to the invitation is that you will agree to state upon the floor of the House the exact impression you may gain from such investigation.

You have for some time been attacking the river and harbor bills reported to the House, and the Oklawaha River project has been one of the special objects of your attack and therefore it seems to me that this is a proposition which is eminently fair to the project, to the people behind it, to the Florida delegation who advocate it, as well as to yourself.

If you simply desire that the facts may be known and that justice may be done, this is your opportunity to learn at first hand what these facts are. I cordially join with this committee in inviting you to go to Florida at any time convenient to yourself. If you will advise me as to when it will be convenient for you to make the trip, I will see to it that all the necessary arrangements are made.

Trusting that you may find it convenient to accept the invitation of these good people and learn the exact truth as to this waterway and the proposed project, and asking that you will extend me the courtesy of an early reply, I am,

Yours, very truly, FRANK CLARK.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1917.

Mr. G. G. WARE, Leesburg, Fla.

MY DEAR SIR: Yours of the 3d instant, addressed to Mr. CLARK, has been transmitted to me, together with the article from the Leesburg paper, inserted in the paper by a Florida Representative.

If information is needed further than that furnished by the Leesburg paper, the Government engineers' reports, and disinterested people of excellent standing who are familiar with the river and whose judgment has been given, I will write you for additional information.

The speech to which you take exception was made nearly three years ago, during the 1914 debate on the river and harbor bill, which bill was the last one, and only one, to contain the new item for the Oklawaha. Though passed by the House, the item was stricken out by the Senate committee, together with the Kissimmee new project, before the bill was reported to the Senate. That bill was subsequently defeated. Apparently the Senate committee, acting on its own initiative, came to the same conclusion regarding the inadvisability of appropriating three-quarters of a million dollars for the Oklawaha.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES A. FREAR.

I desire also to file for printing in the RECORD a telegram which I have received to-day from the Ocala (Fla.) Board of Trade advocating this improvement, which reads as follows:

OCALA, FLA., January 22, 1917.

Hon. FRANK CLARK, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Ocala, Leesburg, Umatilla, Eustis, Tavares, Marion County, and Lake County, together with adjacent territory, are dependent on improvements of the Oklawaha and Silver Springs Rivers to give them reasonable and competing rates of freight. Our many thousands of tons of incoming and outgoing freights per annum would double the first year after the water rates were given by the improvement of the rivers. The rapid development of this, the most fertile and resourceful section of the State, would be unprecedented in a very few years. The billions of tons of phosphate and lime, the billions of feet of manufactured lumber and saw logs, with millions of crossties, shingles, piling, hundreds of thousands of tons of agricultural products, cattle, hogs, horses, and mules, together with thousands of boxes of oranges, grapefruit, and vegetables. We respectfully urge the undivided support of our Senators and Members of Congress to do all in their power to give us the relief prayed for by the improvement to the Oklawaha and Silver Springs Rivers.

MARION COUNTY BOARD OF TRADE,
L. R. TRAMMEL, Secretary.

Permit me to say that Ocala is a city of some eight or nine thousand people, a very progressive city, in the center of a magnificent agricultural section and in the heart of the hard-rock phosphate region of the State of Florida and tributary to the Ocklawaha River.

Permit me to state, Mr. Chairman, that this river is about 125 miles in length. It rises in a chain of lakes near Leesburg, and a number of other cities and towns in Florida grace the shores of these lakes, and flows in a northerly direction, emptying into the St. Johns River at Welaka.

The engineers surveyed the river. The local engineer, the Chief of Engineers, and the Board of Engineers all concurred in recommending this improvement as a meritorious and worthy one. This project was in the river and harbor bill of 1914 and passed this House. It was killed in the Senate, because that was the time when the Senate struck out all items and appropriated a lump sum for the old improvements.

Mr. SHERWOOD. When was that report made?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The report of the Government engineers was in 1914. I want to state that Leesburg is just about the same distance from Jacksonville, Fla., as is Sanford, Fla. Sanford, Fla., enjoys water transportation, being near the head of navigation on the St. Johns River. It also has rail transportation. The freight rates from Jacksonville to Sanford are just about one-half what the rates are from Jacksonville to Leesburg, and the improvement of this waterway will save to the people of Leesburg and that vicinity $400,000 or $500,000 annually in freight, as shown by the report of the engineers.

I want to say further that Ocala, a city of some eight or nine thousand population, is within 5½ miles of Silver Springs, at the head of what we know as Silver Springs Run, which is navigable, and which flows into the Oklawaha River. Ocala and all that surrounding country will be tributary to this waterway, and there will be a saving on freight to the people of Ocala and the country tributary to it of $500,000 or $600,000 additional, making a saving in freights on the commerce there to-day of approximately a million dollars a year to the people of that country by this improvement.

Since this report was made various other enterprises have gone into that country. In the Oklawaha River Valley the lands are as rich as any lands on the earth. Right in front of the Speaker's desk now is a picture of a part of a cornfield of 1,000 acres which last year produced 100,000 bushels of corn without a particle of fertilizer. There is no land in this country that can excel that, even in the corn belt of the West; a thousand acres with 100 bushels of corn to the acre clear through it is a yield that can be equaled in but few localities.

Our people down there have recently begun to raise hay. There was a time, only two or three years ago, when practically all the hay used in the State of Florida was shipped into it from the West. Since the Agricultural Department has found Sudan grass and Natal grass and Rhodes grass our people have been experimenting with these grasses, and Natal grass especially finds a home there. Only last year in this very same valley there were over 30,000 tons of Natal grass hay raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will $100,000 complete this work?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No. The engineers recommend $733,000 for the whole improvement. Mr. Chairman, this waterway strikes right through the very heart of the State of Florida. It runs 125 miles in length through the very center of the State.

The gentleman from Wisconsin speaks of the fact that they have a railroad there. That is true. There are two railroads that strike Leesburg and most of the towns in this community, but there are great sections of country where the railroad lies 50 or 60, and in some places 75 miles from the river, and there is that great stretch of country in there with absolutely no transportation on the face of the earth to-day. The people are going in and settling it up. Right across is one of these little towns, Howey, just established. They have built a hotel with 50 rooms, stores have sprung up, they have electric lights, and it is quite a flourishing little village. The people have gone into clearing this hammock land, which is the richest on earth. They are raising hogs and cattle and grain and hay, and all of those products which are heavy in their nature and which can and will take advantage of water transportation.

I want to say, further, that right contiguous to this waterway are great beds of kaolin, infusorial earth, and phosphates, and in the county of Lake, where these lakes are, the headwaters of the waterway, there are millions of tons of the finest of road-building clay in the world. There are many counties in our State which have not the clay to build these hard roads which they have bonded themselves to build, and the clay is being shipped into other counties for road-building purposes. It is too expensive to ship it on the railroad. If these waterways are improved, millions of tons of clay will be shipped into other counties. I might say that different counties in Florida have bonded themselves within the last year or two to the amount of $12,000,000 to build these hard roads, and the time is not far distant when there will be a perfect network of hard roads all over the State. As I say, some counties have not got this clay, and this material will be shipped into those counties. Lake County has an abundance of it, and if this waterway is improved all the counties in the middle section of the State can avail themselves of it and get the benefit of cheap transportation for road-building material. Mr. Chairman, the engineers have approved of this item, and I sincerely trust that it will stay in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as I have previously stated, there is to-day enough of commerce tributary to the Ocklawaha River upon which, if this improvement is made, there will result in a saving to the people living in that territory approximately $1,000,000 per annum in freight charges. Surely an undertaking which will produce such beneficent results can not be a bad investment for the Government. Enterprises are to-day awaiting the action of Congress with relation to this improvement, and as soon as this project is adopted, these enterprises will take form, and both population and commerce will increase by leaps and bounds in that favored territory. With millions of acres of the most fertile and productive soil under the sun; with vast areas of timber and timber products; with millions of tons of phosphate, kaolin, infusorial earth, or kisselguhr; with unlimited quantities of as fine road-building clay as can be found on this hemisphere; with our cattle, hogs, farms, groves, and gardens; with our incomparable climate and progressive people we only need this waterway to give the world an object lesson in progress such as has not been witnessed within the past half century.

As to the merits of the project, we have the solemn official report of the Army engineers, men skilled in their profession and charged with the duty of investigating all such propositions and making report upon their official honor. These officers have no interest in this project, and they say that this project is a meritorious one and one worthy to be undertaken by the Government.

On the other hand, only one man in this great body opposes it. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is that man. What does he know about it? Nothing. Is he an engineer skilled in his profession? No. What knowledge has he as to this project? None; absolutely none. I say this, Mr. Chairman, and I am warranted by the facts in saying it. The gentleman from Wisconsin is a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but when the committee held the hearing on this project the gentleman from Wisconsin was not present and did not hear one word of it.

The good people down in Florida who live in the section to be benefited by this proposed improvement, desiring that the gentleman from Wisconsin should see this waterway and the country bordering it, and thus for himself get the truth of the matter, invited him to come down there as their guest, without any expense to himself, and the gentleman declined the invitation. What must we conclude from this action of the gentleman in declining to visit the waterway and in absenting himself from the hearing on this project? Does it look as though the gentleman really wanted to know the truth? Does this conduct indicate that he is seeking to treat this matter fairly and justly? It may be the gentleman will claim he did not visit the river because Congress was in session and he was busy. It will be noted he did not give that excuse in his letter to Mr. Ware, but suppose that was his real reason for declining the invitation; what does the gentleman say about the same invitation extended to him by Capt. Young last year? Ah, Mr. Chairman, in view of all the facts in this case and in view of the fact that the gentleman went out of his way to denounce another bill lately pending in this body as a "sectional bill" constructed in the interest of the South, when there was not a scintilla of evidence to support such contention, we must conclude that the gentleman from Wisconsin is actuated in this matter by his lofty and patriotic desire to emit the venom of a pent-up provincialism upon a great section of our common country. No man rises to the full stature of American citizenship until he is big enough and broad enough to stand for the progress, the betterment, and the glory of every portion of our great Republic. No man is a true American who can not in good conscience plant his feet upon the soil of any State in the Union and say, "This is my own, my native land." No man whose patriotism is not broad enough and deep enough to encompass every section of the Republic is fitted to be a Representative on the floor of the American Congress.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I shall append to these remarks the hearing on this project before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. As heretofore stated, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who is a member of that committee, was not present. The hearing was with relation to the Oklawaha and Kissimmee Rivers, but I shall only insert the portion of it referring to the Oklawaha:

OKLAWAHA AND KISSIMMEE RIVERS, FLA.

COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1917.

The committee, at 12 o'clock m., proceeded to the consideration of the project for the improvement of the Oklawaha River, in the State of Florida.

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANK CLARK, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF FLORIDA.

Mr. CLARK. I want to say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that I think it hardly necessary for me to go into this matter very fully, because it has already been gone into heretofore and the committee, in 1914, reported the item and it passed the House. But as you gentlemen know, it went out in the Senate because that was the time they adopted a lump sum and struck out all items.

The report (Doc. 514), with which I have no doubt the committee is thoroughly familiar, contains a very full exposition of the whole subject. I want to call the attention of the committee to some of the commerce that is tributary to this waterway as shown at that time, and also to the freight rate and the question of its effect upon this commerce. The committee will remember that Sanford, Fla., is about the same distance from Jacksonville as Leesburg, on this waterway, and the freights, as given here at the time of this report, show that the rates were just about one-half from Jacksonville to Sanford of the rates from Jacksonville to Leesburg, the proposition being, of course, that if this waterway is improved it will mean a tremendous saving in freights to the people tributary to that waterway.

The country adjacent to this river has improved a great deal since then, and I especially want to call the attention of the committee to some of the things that have transpired to make this very much more important now than at that time, and I expect I am going to say something that is going to surprise the committee very much. I know it would surprise some others of the members of the committee if they were present. Since this report was made there is an instance of a thousand acres of land tributary to this waterway which has been developed, planted in corn this last year, and 100,000 bushels of corn gathered from that thousand acres. To show you something of the fertility of the soil and something of the productiveness of it, and something of what is going on in that country, I have here a picture of a portion of that corn field that I would like very much for the committee to look at while I am calling attention to some other facts with reference to it. And I want to state that there are very, very, many thousands of acres of land undeveloped just as productive as this thousand acres which has been put into cultivation. And also tributary to it is a Natal hay field. The people down in that country have just begun raising hay. This is a new hay which was introduced into our section of the country by the Department of Agriculture. The fact has been that until late years all the hay used in the State of Florida has been shipped into it; but the people have found by actual test that Rhodes grass and Sudan grass and Natal grass all grow to perfection in that country, and they are now engaged in raising immense quantities of hay, and they are raising corn, too.

It was thought for a long time down in our particular section of the country that corn could not be grown to any advantage, but the fact is that the heavy hammock lands in that section of the country are just as rich as the Valley of the Nile, and just as productive, and there is an actual demonstration of it when 1,000 acres in a body of land produced 100,000 bushels of corn.

Mr. BOOHER. What do you mean by hammock land?

Mr. CLARK. Hammock land is what you call bottom land in your district. It is a heavy soil covered with oak, hickory, and magnolia.

The CHAIRMAN. All of the hardwoods grow in that section?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. As a rule, there is very little pine timber on it?

Mr. CLARK. Very little. Occasionally you will find some; you will find very many palmetto trees scattered about.

The CHAIRMAN. Hammock land is covered with hardwood as distinguished from pine land?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. COSTELLO. What is the approximate value of land like that on which this corn was grown?

Mr. CLARK. That is slightly over $200 an acre.

Mr. EDWARDS. That is in its cleared state?

Mr. CLARK. That is in its cleared state and put in cultivation. There are 22,000 acres in that tract, and you can not buy an acre of it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is worth more than $200 an acre. I apprehend you could not buy that hammock land for $200 an acre.

Mr. CLARK. After it is in cultivation I presume you could not; but I presume if you would take a large body of land you would get a good deal of that hammock on it, and probably you would get it for $50 an acre.

Mr. EDWARDS. What is the nearest large town to this improvement?

Mr. CLARK. There are a number of towns, Mr. EDWARDS, that are tributary to it. There is Ocala, and the country tributary to Ocala would be largely benefited by this improvement. Ocala is a town of six or seven thousand population, in the center of a very large agricultural country. Then there is Leesburg, and although the census shows only about 1,500, I think, within the corporate limits, it has really about 4,000 population.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is Ocala below the frost line?

Mr. CLARK. There is a question about where the frost line is. It is not very cold there. They grow citrous fruits there all right.

Mr. EDWARDS. They do at Leesburg all right.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, yes. I want to state further that there has been established, since this report was made, at Leesburg (which is practically at the head of this improvement), I mean on the lake at the head of the Oklawaha River, a station for the gathering of hides, furs, bones, iron, rags, paper, and other articles, by-products, and junk, which needs water transportation. This handles not less than 100 tons a month. A moss-refining industry is being established at Leesburg with a capacity of 5 tons daily, which needs water transportation. A company is being organized to establish a boat line from Leesburg to Jacksonville, with two trips weekly, carrying passengers and freight. Stock to the amount of $4,500 has been subscribed to date. If the greater depth is granted, this line will make daily sailings and will put on large freight boats.

Steps have been taken for the establishment on the shore of Lake Griffin Canal of a bonded warehouse for Natal hay, of which there is approximately 30,000 tons produced each year along the river and on the shores of the lakes. And the growing of this Natal hay is just a matter of the last three or four years. The people have just begun to get started. I think—in fact, I know—it originated with the Department of Agriculture in sending out these little packages of grass seed. I sent a good many of them all over that country, and I know the rest of the delegation did, and it got started in that way, and it is undoubtedly the hay for that country. And they are making the best of it.

I want to call your attention to an article here, gentlemen, on the subject of this improvement and advocating the improvement. It says:

"By far the greatest development of the past year in the domain of this project is the bringing under cultivation of the rich muck land in the Oklawaha Valley below Lake Griffin. This year there was one field of corn, 1,000 acres in extent, which produced approximately 100,000 bushels of corn. From that field alone 3,400 tons were carried by water, and water transportation was the only possible hope. If it had been necessary to haul that corn to a railroad for shipment, it would have required a haul of 4 miles and a return of the same distance with empty wagons. The road is both hilly and sandy, and the loads would have been small. It would have been a task to daunt the most valiant. So it was lightered in shallow barges at great inconvenience and with ever-present danger of striking a twist in the stream that the barge could not be drawn around.

"Across Lake Harris from Leesburg is the new town of Howey, which has added a great deal to the tonnage this year. This town has a new hotel of 50 rooms, the material for which was brought to Howey by water. In fact, there is no other way to reach Howey except by team or auto. There are upward of 500 tons of material and fixtures in this building alone. Then Howey has imported farm machinery, tools, electric-light equipment, dynamite, and other industrial supplies to the extent of approximately 1,000 tons more. Food supplies and other products, with furniture and hardware for the homes, add considerably to the total, making the tonnage for this one little community not less than 2,000 tons. This is all new in the past 12 months, and it is not only permanent but is merely a start toward a great tonnage that will grow larger from year to year.

"There are now over 12,000 acres of land in Lake County alone producing hay. The average production is 2½ tons to the acre for the year, making a total now of 30,000 tons. Less than one-fourth of this is consumed on the farms where it is produced, but must be shipped to the open market for redistribution. That gives a total of 22,500 tons of hay which moves now, and with a constantly growing acreage this will grow by leaps and bounds. To go back three years, it is found that the total production was about 100 tons of this hay. A jump from 100 tons to 30,000 tons in three years is something that transportation facilities must be prepared to meet, and when it is known that the acreage being cleared for this Natal hay is greater now than ever before the great increase in the immediate future can be seen very readily.

"There is one great industry which is only awaiting the providing of water transportation to spring into being, furnishing a tonnage that will be greater than any industry now affords. This is in road clay.

"Lake County is underlaid with a peculiar formation of clay, and this is of particularly good quality for road building in the section adjoining the lakes. All along the Oklawaha and the St. Johns Rivers are counties where road material has to be imported. The 250 miles of good roads in Lake County can be reproduced in any of these river counties when it is possible to float barges of the clay that is so plentiful in Lake County, but in order to make it profitable or even possible to transport this clay it must be moved in large lots.

"The supply of this clay is practically inexhaustible and the demand so great that it insures a permanent commerce if water transportation is provided.

"All of these things that have been presented are new."

I have the figures, and I will file them with the committee. At Ocala—Ocala, you gentlemen will remember, is about 4½ miles from Silver Springs. Silver Springs Run empties into the Oklawaha River and is tributary to it. The people of Ocala at one time had a small boat or two running on that run and going to Jacksonville, in fact. They have a hard road, and there is a railroad right to the spring at the head of the run. There is a strong movement on foot to build an electric line now from Ocala to Silver Springs, which would make that entire country there tributary to this waterway. So that if this improvement is made, it not only means all these towns along these lakes and along the Oklawaha River proper, which are Leesburg, Eustis, Mount Dora, Tavares, Tangarine, Lisbon, Harvey, and other towns, but it means a benefit to the business of Ocala and that whole surrounding country, which is immense. I have a statement from the Ocala Board of Trade showing the freights which they paid last year, and Ocala is about as far from Jacksonville as Sanford, and the rates which obtained from Jacksonville to Ocala would be about the same as to Leesburg. They paid in freights $996,000 and some odd—practically a million dollars in freights. And it is figured that this improvement would cut that practically in half, which would be a saving for the Ocala country of at least $450,000 to $500,000 in freight rates.

Now, I want to call your attention for a moment or two to what Maj. Slattery (Capt. Slattery at that time) said with reference to this:

"I am of the opinion that a material development of this country would follow the construction of a reliable waterway from Lake Dora to the mouth of the river, suitable connecting waterways being provided to points on the shores of the lakes at the headwaters; that the improvement of the river is worthy of being undertaken by the United States, notwithstanding the fact that the cost will be great, compared with the commerce that will be benefited at the present time and for some years hence; that three plans of improvement should be considered. * * *

"The canals at Leesburg will provide public terminals under the control of the municipal authorities, and it is stated by those interested in the improvement that similar facilities will be provided at other points.

"Along the banks of the river there is much marshland, which would be highly productive if reclaimed. It may be possible to coordinate the reclamation of this land with the improvement of the river in the interest of navigation."

The CHAIRMAN. That has not been done in this project?

Mr. CLARK. No.

The CHAIRMAN. No reclamation of land is involved?

Mr. CLARK. No; I understand not. He mentions that, though, in his report. I just mention it to show his opinion.

Mr. KETTNER. You have read the proviso on page 2, have you, of that report?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. There would be no difficulty about that at all, Mr. Kettner. The people understand that thoroughly, and are willing for that sort of a condition to be attached to it, so far as that is concerned. They are willing to meet it.

Now, gentlemen, if you have noticed the map attached to this report—I wish you would look at it for a moment, if you have not noticed it—you will see that the Oklawaha River begins in this chain of lakes up here near Leesburg. Leesburg is between Lakes Harris and Griffin, an immense chain of lakes. There is Lake Harris, at this point, and Leesburg is located right here, between Lake Harris and Lake Griffin [indicating on map]. Here is Lake Eustis, Lake Dora, and all of this chain of lakes here [indicating], and the river comes out of Lake Griffin, goes in a northerly direction here [indicating]. Here is Silver Springs Run, here is Silver Springs, and here is Ocala [indicating]. Silver Springs Run comes out of the spring which, by the way, is an immense body of water. I was on it last fall, and it is some 60 or 70 feet deep; and I would like to say for the benefit of the committee that, although I have lived in Florida for about 33 years now and I have been to Silver Springs, I never really realized what it was until that trip. There is nothing in the United States any more wonderful than Silver Springs, right there near that place.

Mr. EDWARDS. Why is it so wonderful?

Mr. CLARK. Well, you go out in a glass-bottom boat they have there, and the water is so clear and crystal you can see a 10-cent piece on the bottom of the lake, sometimes 60 or 70 feet deep.

Mr. EDWARDS. Can you see anything besides money on the bottom?

Mr. CLARK. You can see anything; yes. It is perfectly clear, and there are great caverns, apparently, under there. There is one place called Christmas Eve, with a lot of beautiful trees, which look like Christmas trees, on the bottom, apparently covered with tinsel. And there is one scene of a snowstorm down there. The water coming up from the bottom, I presume, throws little fine particles of rock into the water, presenting the appearance of a snowstorm. It is a wonderful place, and there is plenty of water there, and the boats come right up——

Mr. EDWARDS. Is it sulphur water?

Mr. CLARK. No; it is not strong with sulphur.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does it have any health-giving qualities?

Mr. CLARK. I do not know that it has, Mr. Edwards; it is just a clear, pure water.

Mr. KETTNER. Has the gentleman ever visited the Catalina Islands?

Mr. CLARK. No; but I would like to. And I want you to see Silver Springs, too. I was going to say this river runs up here, and there is Silver Springs; there is the run coming down into the Oklawaha River, and then the river goes on up in a northerly direction and comes into the St. Johns River at Welaka, which is in Mr. SEARS's district.

Mr. BOOHER. What is the distance from the source of the river to the mouth?

Mr. CLARK. I should judge it must be 125 or 150 miles—isn't it, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. What is that question; I did not catch it?

Mr. CLARK. The distance from the source of the river to the mouth?

The CHAIRMAN. About 125 miles.

Mr. BOOHER. What part of that is this proposed improvement to cover?

Mr. CLARK. The improvement, as I understand it, is to cover from the source here to Silver Springs Run.

The CHAIRMAN. There may have to be some work down below?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; there may be some work to be done below; but, as I understand it, that part is in pretty good condition at the present time.

Mr. BOOHER. How far is the river navigable now; or is it navigable?

Mr. CLARK. Oh, yes; it is navigable up to Silver Springs.

Mr. BOOHER. And then from Silver Springs, or Silver Springs Run; is that where this improvement is to be made?

Mr. KETTNER. No; from Lake Harris to Silver Springs.

Mr. CLARK. Lake Harris is down at the source of the river.

The CHAIRMAN. It extends to the head of Silver Springs Run.

Mr. CLARK. It is over here [indicating] and runs to the head of Silver Springs Run.

The CHAIRMAN. And the upper end of the improvement is at Lake Dora?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; at Lake Dora; and there are canals connecting those lakes.

The CHAIRMAN. Lake Dora is near Tavares?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; at Tavares. Tavares is the county seat of the county in which Leesburg is situated.

Mr. BOOHER. How long is the river before it goes into the St. Johns River?

Mr. CLARK. About one hundred and twenty-five or thirty miles; something like that. And I want to call your attention, too, to the fact that this stream runs right through the heart of the State. It touches the very heart of the State of Florida. It goes through some of the most productive lands in the whole State. Anything can be grown there except apples and wheat; but almost anything else in the world can be grown right there tributary to this waterway, and if they can get a permanent watercourse there that will be navigable at all times—and the engineers say we can—it is going to develop a wonderful commerce through that country between all this lower country from here to Jacksonville [indicating on map].

Mr. BOOHER. What are the rail facilities through that country? Have you railroads through that country?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; the Seaboard Air Line and the Atlantic Coast Line.

Mr. EDWARDS. There is an immense area there that is without transportation except on the coast.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, yes; so is this area here [indicating]; there is no railroad here at all.

Mr. HULBERT. The Oklawaha River runs parallel to the railroad, doesn't it?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; but some distance from it.

Mr. BOOHER. Is there a railroad on both sides of the river?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. Here is the Atlantic Coast Line right here.

Mr. BOOHER. How close does that get to the river?

Mr. CLARK. Oh, I do not know how close.

Mr. BOOHER. What is the average distance from the river of the railroad on the west?

The CHAIRMAN. The Atlantic Coast Line is the nearest.

Mr. CLARK. The Atlantic Coast Line is the nearest. I can not say what the average distance is; it is so crooked.

The CHAIRMAN. It varies, probably, from 5 to 10 miles.

Mr. BOOHER. From the river?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. How far is the river from the other railroad?

Mr. CLARK. This is the Atlantic Coast Line on this side [indicating]. That is a very great distance; you see up here it is two-thirds across the State.

Mr. BOOHER. Then it is 100 or 200 miles from this river?

Mr. CLARK. It must be at least 100.

Mr. HULBERT. Is Lake George navigable?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; Lake George is part of the St. Johns River.

Mr. HULBERT. And the Atlantic Coast Line, which you have just referred to, parallels Lake George and its connection with the St. Johns River?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULBERT. So that that section of the State is served by the Atlantic Coast Line and also by a navigable lake, Lake George, and the St. Johns River?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULBERT. And the west side of the State is served by the Ocala Northern Railway and the Oklawaha River, which parallel one another.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. There are minerals which are being produced there, kieselguhr and kaolin earth?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir. That was all covered in the former report, you know.

The CHAIRMAN. That is rather heavy freight?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; extremely heavy.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that they will constitute one of the important items of commerce down this river whenever it is improved; at least, that is the purpose of it?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Kieselguhr is something that enters into the manufacture of explosives, I believe, and kaolin is used in making chinaware.

Mr. COSTELLO. And they use it for filtering purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is there any potash along the proposed improvement?

Mr. CLARK. We have phosphates.

Mr. TAYLOR. Phosphates, I mean.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, yes; there is a great deal of phosphate all through that country, and that would be transported that way.

I do not think of anything else, unless the committee desires to ask some questions, as everything is so thoroughly set out in that report of Maj. Slattery's.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Would you point out on this big map where this improvement is located?

Mr. CLARK. Here is Ocala right here; Silver Spring: is here——

Mr. EDWARDS. That is in the same county with Ocala?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; in the same county; Marion County. Here is Leesburg; the Oklawaha River comes right up this way [indicating on map].

Mr. HUMPHREY. Then it goes out the St. Johns River?

Mr. CLARK. When it gets here, it comes down here and down to there; it starts here and goes around [indicating].

Mr. HUMPHREY. Do you remember the distance?

Mr. CLARK. About 125 miles.

Mr. BOOHER. As I understand you, the principal part of the improvement is to be made between Silver Springs and Starkes Ferry?

Mr. CLARK. No; it is to be made here, from Leesburg up.

Mr. BOOHER. From Leesburg up?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; that is where the improvement is to be made. It would be about 60 miles across there in the pine country where there is not any transportation at all.

Mr. BOOHER. There is no railroad here at all?

Mr. CLARK. None at all.

Mr. BOOHER. What railroad is that [indicating on map]?

Mr. CLARK. That is the Coast Line?

Mr. BOOHER. And then between the Oklawaha River and the Coast Line there are places 60 to 70 miles across most of the way?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Then on the west side of the river the railroad comes in at Ocala?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. And about how far from Ocala is that?

Mr. CLARK. From Ocala over to Silver Springs is about 5½ miles. That puts you at the head of Silver Springs Run and that lands you into the Oklawaha.

I do not know, gentlemen, that I care to take up any more time. I would like to file a statement with reference to the commerce at Ocala and the country tributary to it. I had that statement, but forgot to bring it along.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I wish you would do that, Mr. Clark.

Mr. CLARK. I would like to do that, because I contend when this improvement is made it is going to benefit all that whole section of the country.

A gentleman asked about the hammock land and the kind of growth. I would like to say you find live-oak trees 3, 5, or 6 feet in diameter, and you could put one of them out in the middle of the street here and it would touch the curb on each side—one of these wide streets.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not appeal much to Mr. KETTNER, however, out in California.

Mr. CLARK. No; but it takes good land to produce trees like that; you will agree to that?

Mr. KETTNER. Yes; indeed.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask Mr. CLARK one question: What is the special urgency of the adoption of this Oklawaha project at this time, and to what extent would it suffer if it was passed over until the Sixty-fifth Congress?

Mr. CLARK. Well, Mr. HULBERT, the country is rapidly improving. Florida gained more, the census people say, in percentage of population in the last year, than any State in the Union. I get that from the Census Bureau.

Mr. HULBERT. Does that take it Palm Beach and Ormond Beach?

Mr. CLARK. It takes in actual all-the-year-around residents, and not tourists. And that is a fact; that is a statement we get from the Census Bureau—that we gained in percentage a greater population than any State in the Union. The country is building up very rapidly. These people are paying enormous freight rates, and it is absolutely impossible for them to keep it up. They have continued and they have lived, but they are not getting a fair show in the race of life as long as they have to pay those enormous rates of freight.

Mr. HULBERT. What I mean is, Is there any particular urgency for the adoption of it at this time?

Mr. CLARK. I do not know that there is any particular urgency for its adoption at this time, except that the sooner they get relief from the intolerable conditions under which they are laboring the better off they will be and the better for the country.

Mr. EDWARDS. And the saving of the freight rates in that one locality alone would almost pay for it?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. The freight savings in one year, as shown by this report, would be $600,000. If it would amount to four or five hundred thousand in the Ocala country alone, you would have millions saved in freight.

Mr. EDWARDS. And it would more than pay for it with the savings in one year?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. I understand that two years ago, in view of this proviso Mr. KETTNER referred to a while ago, the people in the community got ready for this work, and they have secured the right of way and have complied with that proviso; and they are ready at any time to close the matter up.

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand, the Government is not to purchase any right of way at all?

Mr. CLARK. None at all; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Government is not to be at any expense for securing the right of way?

Mr. CLARK. Not a particle; and, of course, the committee understands, I suppose, that Leesburg has issued bonds for the purpose of connecting those two canals; that is shown in the report here—connecting those two lakes, I mean—Lake Harris and Lake Griffin.

Mr. DUPRÉ. That is in the committee's proviso?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. And a part of that work has already been done, and they are ready to go forward at any time they know this improvement is going ahead.

(The following is the statement filed by Mr. CLARK:)

Incoming and outgoing freight, Ocala, Fla., and tributary territory, compiled by Ocala Board of Trade—This freight would all be affected by Oklawaha River improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Kissimmee River, Fla.: For maintenance, $4,000; completing improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 137, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $47,000; in all, $51,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 6, 7, 8, and 9 on page 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19 strike out lines 6, 7, 8, and 9.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is the same motion I made when this item was up four years ago, and I have seen nothing to change my judgment in regard to it now. I will not discuss the Oklawaha River any further than to say that I have information of men who have run it, who have turned the pilot wheel on the river, men who stand high in the Northwest as any men, have told me that my judgment of the river is entirely right.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman tell us who these men are?

Mr. FREAR. One is a former governor of a State who has lived there and knows the conditions. There were three men, two of whom came to my office. Two are constituents of mine, one was Capt. Doughty, of my own district, living on the Mississippi river.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the gentleman think he ought to quote authority on the floor attacking a project——

Mr. FREAR. I am quoting Army engineers and the gentleman criticized me because I did not take advantage of the courtesy of these people and go down there when every Member of the House knows that I have been engaged on bills which have been before this House almost all the time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman did not get my question. I ask him if he thinks it is fair and right to attack a project upon this floor upon the authority of people whom he will not name?

Mr. FREAR. No; but on the authority of the Army engineers' report. I may say that the gentleman's invitation to me to go down and accept the courtesy of the people there, of course, was impracticable.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the Army engineers recommend it?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and I am reading from the report of the conditions there. The gentleman is championing his own projects and that is all right. He has the same privilege that I have to criticize this or others. Why, Mr. Chairman, in our State we have a commission that reduces freight rates. By looking at the map of the Oklawaha every point on it appears to be within 10 miles of a railroad. It seems to me that what the people want is to go to the railroad commission and have them fix rates, and not ask the Government of the United States to spend this large amount of money when there is such a small amount of commerce.

Coming now to the Kissimmee River——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, just one moment while the gentleman is on the Oklawaha River. It is true the House has adopted that project in so far as it can adopt it, but I want to call attention to the fact that it is not adopted in its entirety. The full $733,000 is not to be expended in carrying out the part of the project we have adopted. It is some two or three hundred thousand dollars less than that amount. I do not recall the exact figures, but it is a good deal less, because we only adopted the locks with the 6-foot depth while providing for the construction of the channels outside of the locks to a depth of 4 feet, which reduces the cost very materially. Of course I shall be frank enough to say that I think that when that channel is completed, and the commercial development takes place which I believe is going to take place, Congress will also authorize the digging of the channel to a depth of 6 feet outside of the locks, but the project as we have adopted it here does not contemplate anything beyond 4 feet outside of the locks.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, accepting the statement of the chairman, which is always very fair in such cases, he says it will probably lead to a project of 6 feet, which, of course, will run fully as deep as the present project.

Referring to the Kissimmee River, we have spent only a small amount on that river. We have an old project on the river, but this is a new project, and on page 29 of House Document No. 137, Sixty-third Congress, first session, the report of the engineers, I find that one steamboat line uses this waterway and that this line operates two light-draft boats and a number of barges, which make one round trip every week throughout the year, except when it is rendered impassible by excessively low stages of water. Although the amount of commerce handled on this river is extremely small, the board is of opinion that the river is worthy of improvement.

Turning back to page 15, there is a statement which I read into the RECORD four years ago, and which, it seems to me, is entitled to appear again. It is from Clay Johnson, who furnishes the information to the Army engineers, showing that in 1902 there were six and a half months when the boats could not use the river on account of the drought; in 1903, none; 1904, four months; in 1905, one and a half months; in 1906, none; in 1907, eight months; and in 1908, five months. It could not be used during those periods in those years. The commerce upon this river, according to a statement from the State Bank of Kissimmee, signed by Clay Johnson, the same individual, as will be found on page 14 of the report, amounted to 20,000,000 pounds and over, or about 10,000 tons, and of that some 6,000 tons were logs. Again comes the Kissimmee State Bank's report subsequent to that, in 1907, showing again 10,000 tons of commerce, of which a large portion, I presume over half, apparently, was logs, and the next year a commerce about one-half of which is logs. So that the commerce is small. On page 15 of the document there is a letter written by G. F. Kribbs to the United States Engineer Office, and in that letter Mr. Kribbs states that there may be a real estate project there, so to speak. He says that the tract of land he mentioned is the Fort Gardner lands, comprising some 25,339 acres, and that it is owned by recent purchase by E. W. Bowen & Co., of Delphi, Ind. I suppose that is offered in evidence to enlarge the commerce and help conditions down there. The point I wish to make is that after the money we have put into this river, making it navigable enough to have two boats that travel once a week on a round trip, where there are but 10,000 tons of commerce a year, half of which is logs, which is extremely small, and where the river is dry or so nearly that they are unable to operate the boats for sometimes as much as eight months in the year, it does not seem that it is now a wise policy for the Government, whether the river be in Wisconsin or Florida, to continue its improvements as is proposed here.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. HULBERT. I want to get cleared up in my mind the matter of the resolution which the gentleman stated he had introduced for an investigation in regard to the letting of contracts by the Army engineers. Was that in the Sixty-third Congress or the Sixty-fourth?

Mr. FREAR. The Sixty-third.

Mr. HULBERT. Has the gentleman reintroduced the resolution in this Congress?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. When was it introduced?

Mr. FREAR. Yesterday.

Mr. HULBERT. So that the gentleman made no attempt to bring the matter to the attention of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the Sixty-fourth Congress at the first session of the Congress, nor in the second session until after the committee had reported its bill and the bill had been presented and was being considered under the five-minute rule?

Mr. FREAR. That is true. I will say to the gentleman this, that when the facts were called to my attention as they have been here, when I discovered by the reports that one company was controlling all of the contracts, then it occurred to me that it was time to make an investigation again.

The matter had passed from my mind during last session. It is for the committee to act and ask if a hearing was wanted. It is immaterial, I am only one individual Member of this Congress. I am not a prosecuting officer. If it was worthy of consideration the committee would have sent for me and I would have been very glad to have gone before them and furnished the evidence I had.

Mr. HULBERT. The bill was not before the committee until introduced yesterday.

Mr. FREAR. I am referring to the Sixty-third Congress.

Mr. HULBERT. And I am talking about the Sixty-fourth.

Mr. FREAR. It was not developed, I am trying to explain to the gentleman, until I discovered in the Army engineer's report the fact that all of the Baltimore district was controlled by this dredging company. That caused me to make the inquiry.

Mr. HULBERT. When did the gentleman first discover it?

Mr. FREAR. Several days ago, because I had been busy on other matters, let me assure the gentleman.

Mr. HULBERT. When did the gentleman introduce the resolution?

Mr. FREAR. I introduced it yesterday at the same time——

Mr. HULBERT. Why did not the gentleman introduce the resolution as soon as he found that condition of affairs existed and ask for a hearing before this bill was considered?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me I have made a fair explanation and it strikes me that that is not a fair criticism. The gentleman criticizes me for not having introduced the resolution——

Mr. HULBERT. Why did not the gentleman call for a hearing? He is on the committee.

Mr. FREAR. That is impossible; the gentleman is only one passenger on the committee.

Mr. HULBERT. I have been a very active passenger, and I can not say as much for the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FREAR. I was referring to myself, and that may be true, but I want to say this, that the newspapers of New York, I understand, quoted the gentleman he would not vote for the bill unless the new projects were put in for New York Harbor. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. HULBERT. There is not such a statement in any paper of New York City.

Mr. FREAR. I read something to that effect some days ago.

Mr. HULBERT. And I challenge the gentleman to produce any such paper.

[Mr. SEARS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the House only a few moments on the motion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. This is, in my judgment, one of the best river projects in the bill. There are only two or three which might be placed above it, if indeed there are any. Newtown Creek, N. Y., and probably Westchester Creek carry a larger tonnage in proportion to the amounts expended upon them, respectively, but the first named is almost in a class by itself. But I hold in my hand a list of projects now on the books, 118 in number, I think, not all of them appropriated for in this bill. In fact, most of them are not appropriated for in this bill, because they do not now need any appropriations. When, however, money is needed for the purpose of maintaining the channels already completed by the Government, such funds will be appropriated. I am going to print this list in the RECORD.

I risk nothing in saying that few, if any, of them make as good showing, when the commerce is compared with the cost of the project, as does the Kissimmee River.

The table is as follows:

List of waterways showing large expenditures when compared to commerce accommodated.

Now, just a word regarding the statement made that this river is dry eight months in the year. I do not know that such statement has been made this afternoon, but it was made before, and I think repeated several times. Now, according to a table which I find in the report, on page 15, there was one year out of seven when the river was too low for boats to run on it for a period of eight months, but the average was much below that. Two of those seven years the boats ran the year round, in one year six and one-half months, in another four months, in another one and one-half months, and in another five months, so that the average is a little more than three months during those seven years.

I want to say further that the navigation on that river has improved during the past few years, and since this report was made, because private individuals have, in a few instances, opened up the channels there so that more water is flowing in from the lakes above than was the case before. The lakes have been lowered, but the channel has been benefited.

It seems to please some critics of this stream to call it a "creek," the idea being, no doubt, to minimize its importance by thus designating it. But I wish to say that it is in no sense a creek, for if a stream from 50 to 100—yes; in some places 300 to 400—feet wide and 137 miles long does not rise to the dignity of a river, then I do not know what it would take to make a river. Furthermore, it runs through one of the richest sections in the world. There are contained in the valley of this stream at least 2,000 square miles, it is said, of the finest muck land to be found anywhere, only waiting to be reclaimed to be of service. I wish to add, however, that this improvement is not intended for reclamation purposes, and the work done in accordance with the project will not reclaim a foot of land.

Now, a word as to the commerce on this stream. It is true that in the report of 1913 the district engineer, quoting from a report made by an assistant dated some time in 1909 or 1910, fixed the commerce at 10,000 tons. But the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1916 gives the commerce at 71,000 tons, showing an increase in six years of 700 per cent. There are few projects, Mr. Chairman, in the country that can show such a healthy growth and such a steady and rapid increase.

Again, I wish to call attention to the fact that this river runs into Lake Okechobee, with a shore line of 90 or 100 miles; that, running out of this lake from the southwest side, is the Caloosahatchee River, which empties into the Gulf, and that this stream is of sufficient depth to accommodate light-draft vessels; indeed, it is now accommodating quite a commerce, as the Engineers' Report will show. In addition to this there are two or three canals cut through in the direction of Miami, on the Atlantic side, all of sufficient capacity to accommodate boats drawing 5 and 6 feet of water. So that this river, in connection with the Caloosahatchee River and the canals metioned, will give a waterway of more than 300 miles in extent.

Another matter mentioned by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] is that there is no railroad paralleling this river and that the only transportation that the people have, or will have for many years to come, is the river, and, in my judgment, it should be improved—at least to the extent recommended in the report—without further delay.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I suggest to the gentleman from Florida that he move that the committee rise.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 20079) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CORRECTION.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the elimination of a paragraph in the RECORD that was placed there by my own mistake. It does not belong in the article at all, for it has nothing to do with the peace documents.

The SPEAKER. How will the Reporters know which paragraph the gentleman refers to?

Mr. FESS. I will point it out to them.

The SPEAKER. Was there any colloquy based upon it?

Mr. FESS. No; it was a mistake of my own.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that if there is any colloquy based on the paragraph it can not be cut out. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

DELAWARE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 7748) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Delaware River may be taken from the Speaker's table and laid before the House, a bill of similar tenor having been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 7748) to authorize the United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Co., and such other corporation or individuals as may be associated with it, to construct a bridge across the portion of the Delaware River between the mainland of the county of Camden and State of New Jersey and Petty Island, in said county and State.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not care at this juncture to make a point of no quorum, but I would like to inquire of the gentleman before the matter is brought up for consideration what part of the Delaware River the bridge is supposed to be built?

Mr. BROWNING. I will state that the William Cramp Sons' Shipbuilding Co. have bought Petty Island, which is about 2 miles long, in the Delaware River and near the Jersey shore. They are unable to go on with the building until the railroad connection is made on the island.

Mr. STAFFORD. And this only provides for a bridge from the mainland to the island?

Mr. BROWNING. That is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Co., a corporation created and organized under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and such other corporation or individuals, if any, as shall be associated with said company for the purpose, their successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the intervening portion of the Delaware River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from the mainland of Camden County, in the State of New Jersey, to Petty Island, in said county and State, in accordance with the provisions of "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and that said bridge may be either for railroad purposes alone, or in part for railroad and in part for highway purposes, at the option of said United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Co.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROWNING, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The bill (H. R. 19776) to authorize the United New Jersey Railroad & Canal Co., and such other corporation or individuals as may be associated with it, to construct a bridge across the portion of the Delaware River between the mainland of the county of Camden, State of New Jersey, and Petty Island, in said county and State, was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the proposed embargo on wheat.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the proposed embargo on wheat. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS NANTICOKE RIVER, DEL.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 7359) authorizing the Delaware Railroad Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Nanticoke River at Seaford, Sussex County, Del., a similar House bill being on the calendar, reported from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 7359, a similar House bill being on the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Delaware Railroad Co., a railroad corporation organized and existing under laws of the State of Delaware, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Nanticoke River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at Seaford, county of Sussex, and State of Delaware, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MILLER of Delaware, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 19000) was laid on the table.

DANISH WEST INDIAN ISLANDS (S. DOC. NO. 686).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, concerning the treaty signed August 4, 1916, between the United States and Denmark for the cession to the United States of the Danish West Indian Islands, and the obligations of the United States under the convention.

The attention of the Congress is especially invited to the necessity for action being taken by the Congress during its present session that will enable the Government of the United States to discharge its conventional obligation to pay to the Government of Denmark the sum of $25,000,000, which, by Article V of the convention, the United States agrees to pay in full consideration of the cession within 90 days from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the convention. This exchange of ratifications was effected on January 17, 1917; so that the good faith of the United States requires the payment of the $25,000,000 not later than April 17, 1917, and to do this provision by the Congress during its present session for the payment is imperative.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The message will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, should not that message be referred to the Committee on Appropriations? It embodies an appropriation which the Government is obliged to make.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Of course, the Appropriation Committee will make the appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. The President calls attention to the exigency that arises, and it is virtually the occasion for a deficiency.

The SPEAKER. But it is something that originates in the diplomatic department of the Government, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State about the purchase of these islands. The Appropriation Committee will have no difficulty in bringing in an appropriation, if it desires to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, may a Member of the House ask the Speaker a question for information?

The SPEAKER. If it is easy.

Mr. FESS. What would happen if the House should refuse to appropriate the necessary money to take care of the requirements of the treaty in this case?

The SPEAKER. It would simply be the end of the matter until another Congress did it. It would be violating one of the treaty stipulations of the country. If the House will bear with the Chair for a moment, the Chair remembers very distinctly the time the House had up for consideration an appropriation of $20,000,000 to pay for the Philippine Islands. Thirty-five Members fought it here to the jumping-off place, but the best lawyers in the House insisted that the treaty having been made, we were under a moral, if not a legal, obligation to pay the money. We had a very warm debate which lasted nearly a day.

Mr. EAGLE. Does the Chair suppose that we will get the same white elephant with these Danish West Indies that we got with the Philippines?

The SPEAKER. Well, it is not as big an elephant at any rate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 24, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting lists of documents and files of papers which are not needed or useful in the transaction of the current business of the department and have no permanent value or historic interest (H. Doc. No. 1974); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,
